

- 36 European Human Rights System
Carmen Thiele 655
- 37 The European Convention on Human Rights and the Protection of Socio-Economic Demands
Ida Elisabeth Koch 673
- 38 National Human Rights Institutions
Valentin Aichele 691
- 39 Human Rights Cities
Barbara Oomen and Moritz Baumgärtel 709
- PART V GLOBAL JUSTICE AND ACCOUNTABILITY 731
- 40 The Extension and Legalization of Human Rights Monika Heupel 733
- 41 Domestic Courts and International Human Rights
Gábor Halmai 749
- 42 Human Rights in Accountability Processes: A Look at Ad Hoc Hybrid Criminal Courts
Brianne McGonigle Leyh 768
- 43 International Jurisdiction
Mark Gibney 786
- 44 From Humanitarian Intervention to the Responsibility to Protect: Old Wine in a New Bottle or the Progressive Development of International Law?
Felipe Gómez Isa 801
- PART VI PEACE, RECONCILIATION AND SUSTAINABILITY 819
- 45 Awareness, Learning and Education in Human Rights
Katherine Covell 821
- 46 "Fact-Based Storytelling" or Fact-Based Activism?
Tensions, Strategies and Next Steps of Human Rights and Journalism Shayna Plaut 840

is for the quoted ICC

creditation

procedure)

Human Rights Cities

Barbara Oomen and Moritz Baumgärtel

INTRODUCTION

One of the most remarkable developments in the field of human rights implementation over the past decades has been the rise of human rights cities. Global urbanization, attention to rights realization and the potential of actors other than the nation-state in this process has led to a multifarious development toward explicit urban engagement with the discourse and practice of international human rights. In this process, international organizations and local authorities have increasingly reached out to one another, often by-passing the nation-state. Whether this concerns San Francisco in the USA adopting a CEDAW ordinance, Graz in Austria conducting a human rights impact assessment, Kaohsiung in Taiwan and Kati in Mali stepping up as human rights cities, Rosario in Argentina combatting domestic violence as a human rights city, or the UN reaching out directly to local authorities, local governments might well be one of the most prominent actors in human rights implementation in the future.

This chapter seeks to theorize the background to the rise of human rights cities and offer a typology of the many shapes that they take. In addition, it briefly discusses the degree to which local authorities have an independent legal obligation to respect, protect, and fulfill international human rights. Complementing this legal perspective with a socio-political approach, it discusses the reasons why cities opt to engage with human rights as well as the potentials and pitfalls, presenting the Dutch city of Utrecht as an illustration. The type of local government involved, the ways in which cities engage with human rights, and their reasons for doing so differ considerably. Nevertheless, this article will define a human rights city as an urban entity or local government that explicitly bases its policies, or some of them, on human rights as laid down in international treaties, thus distinguishing itself from other local authorities.

The contribution is structured as follows. After a discussion of the main reasons for the rise of human rights cities, this article will present an overview of the many ways in which these cities have come to relate their policies to human rights over the past decades. These include, for instance, the 'right to the city' movement, but also the United Cities and Local Government initiative and regional initiatives such as those initiated by the Council of Europe and the European Union. In addition, there are cities that have opted to base policies on one particular human rights issue or treaty, such as CEDAW or CERD. The general typology is followed by a brief discussion of the actual legal obligations of cities in the field of human rights implementation. As is often the case, however, the main reasons for cities to explicitly engage with human rights are social and political rather than purely legal. This socio-political background is illustrated by referring to the city of Utrecht in the Netherlands. Finally, the contribution offers some general conclusions on the potentials and pitfalls of reference to international human rights in formulating urban policies.

BACKGROUND: REASONS FOR THE RISE OF RIGHTS CITIES

What forms the background to the rise in attention to human rights and the city? In essence, this seems to be about a number of large-scale shifts: within the human rights framework itself; in governance; in demographics; and in urban identities.

A first relevant shift is the often noted movement within human rights discourse from standard-setting to implementation. One of the first organizations to define the potential of human rights cities, the People's Movement for Human Rights Education, takes as its point of departure Eleanor Roosevelt's famous statement that human rights begin close to home, and that if they lack meaning there, they lack meaning anywhere (Marks and Modrowski, 2008). In spite of this insight by one of the main authors of the UDHR, most of the intellectual and practical energy of the international community in the first decades after its formation in 1948 went into formulating binding human rights standards such as the ICCPR, the ICESCR, CAT, and CERD, as well as specialized treaties such as the Women's Convention and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Additionally, regional human rights instruments such as the ECHR and ACHPR were negotiated, with an emphasis on the enforcement of rights via the judicial system.

It was only in the 1990s, with the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action as adopted at the World Conference for Human Rights, that the international community shifted its attention toward the actual implementation of

1 their reasons efine a human ses its policies, l treaties, thus the main rea-erview of the cies to human ht to the city' initiative and urope and the se policies on RD. The gen-obligations of case, however, are social and s illustrated by ribution offers ace to interna-

s and the city?
 fs: within the
 ; and in urban

ights discourse tions to define Human Rights ous statement ing there, they
 'this insight by ractical energy n in 1948 went
 , the ICESCR,
 's Convention
 il human rights in emphasis on

Programme of
 at the internaementation of human rights. The Vienna Declaration of 1993, adopted at the end of the Cold War, emphasized the importance of human rights education and monitoring and encouraged the establishment of national human rights institutions.¹ The emphasis on implementation led to a shift – in research and practice alike – away from the nation-state and towards other actors in the realization of rights. One manifestation of this was the widespread recognition, described elsewhere in this volume, of the role of NGOs and businesses in human rights implementation. Another was the setting up of national human rights institutions all over the world to promote and protect human rights at the national level.

In a parallel trajectory, supranational enforcement of human rights was strengthened by expanding the powers of human rights monitoring bodies, appointing special rapporteurs and setting up a new Human Rights Council with the power to periodically review the human rights record of each UN member state. All these bodies would increasingly emphasize the role of local authorities in implementing human rights. The Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women – to take one example among many – on visiting Italy in 2012 not only spoke to representatives of the national government and various NGOs, but also visited Rome, Milan, Bologna, and Naples, and in her report explicitly referred to the importance of local political will to address violence against women.²

A related reason for the rise of rights in discussions on urban policies is the expansion of the rights catalogue itself, and a number of marked shifts in emphasis. Even if the indivisibility of all human rights has always been a formal principle in the international human rights discourse, social and economic rights have gained in enforceability, and thus also in importance, over the past decades (Coomans, 2006). In addition, the due diligence obligations of states in terms of not only not violating but also actually undertaking action to realize human rights obligations have been worked out more explicitly in legal instruments and case law over the past decades. All this has made it more reasonable to shift focus to that level of government best placed to realize rights like those to education, housing, and health care: the local government.

An important shift in governance that also partly explains the rise of human rights cities is the global trend, initiated in the 1980s, toward the decentralization of governmental powers (Otto and Freerks, 1996). Whether this trend was fuelled by theories of good governance and new public management, notions of pluralism and local autonomy, or merely the desire to cut state expenditures, most countries in the world have, over the past decades, transferred important powers to local authorities. Many of these powers concern fields in which human rights can either be realized or violated, from safety to land tenure and from education and health care to the gathering of information and related privacy concerns.

An additional reason for international organizations to cast their eyes on cities as loci for rights realization lies in global demographics. In 2008, for the first time in history, more than half of the world's population lived in towns and cities.³ This number is expected to rise to almost five billion people by 2030. Cities, sociologists state, hold unique potential for human empowerment and for solving social and environmental problems. At the same time, they face important challenges to social cohesion. With people from many different areas and backgrounds grouped together, who have often moved to the city in search of individual autonomy, citizens and governments alike seek to identify a discourse that unites urban residents and forms a common frame of reference in setting out the mutual expectations of the city and its inhabitants.

A final and related shift is closely related to the population increase in cities. Whereas many cities long precede the nation-state and their residents have long felt more attached to their city than to the nation itself, the past decades have also witnessed a marked increase in the assertion of autonomy, and urban identity, of individual cities and local authorities. The rise of city marketing illustrates the degree to which cities, for instance in Europe, have moved from considering themselves as engines for economic growth to also investing considerable resources in the construction, management, and communication of the city's image, to residents and outsiders alike (Paddison, 1993; Kavatzis, 2004).

In all, it is the interplay between the evolution of the human rights framework, shifts in global governance and global demographics and the changing self-image of cities that explains the rise of human rights cities since the early 1990s.

TOWARD A TYPOLOGY OF HUMAN RIGHTS CITIES

Even if more and more cities engage explicitly with international public law, the discourse on the relevance of international human rights to the city comes in many different forms, taken from both a top-down and a bottom-up angle, with emphasis on specific subsets of rights but also human rights in general. This section seeks to describe some of the ways in which cities engage with human rights, giving examples of the cities concerned. While the relationship between rights and city long precedes the formation of the nation-state, this overview focuses on current urban politics which refer to international human rights.

The 'Right to the City' Movement

A movement preceding and inspiring current human rights city initiatives was the rallying around the notion of the 'right to the city', which resulted in a European Charter on the Right to the City and attempts to draw up a World Charter.⁴ The term has its origins in French sociologist Henri Lefebvre's 1968 essay La Droit à la Ville. Reacting to a process of urbanization (in Paris and elsewhere) which was increasingly driven by the interests of capitalism and business, Lefebvre proposed the right as 'a cry and a demand' (Lefebvre, 1996: 158). In his opinion, the creation of urban spaces reinforced already existing social inequalities, thus necessitating a response from those disadvantaged in that process (Lefebvre, 1996; Plyusheva, 2009). Marxist geographers such as Harvey continue to understand the right to the city in this way, suggesting that to invoke the right means 'to claim some kind of shaping power over the processes of urbanization, over the ways in which our cities are made and remade and to do so in a fundamental and radical way' (Harvey, 2012: 5). Here, the right to the city becomes a prism through which to critically investigate the relationship between social exclusion, social rights, and social justice in public spaces (Mitchell, 2003). Sceptics, however, have argued that changes in urban design alone cannot bring about a restructuring of the global capitalist economy (Plyushteva, 2009). Many contemporary NGOs, CSOs, and social movements use therefore a less politicized version of the term and strive simply for the creation of 'a just, accessible and enjoyable city' (Plyushteva, 2009: 86; see also Mayer and Palmowski, 2004; Mayer, 2009).

What, then, does the right to the city concretely entail? While many urban social movements rely on the idea, the right to the city is still very much an umbrella slogan (Mayer, 2009). Attoh (2011) argues that it can be invoked to claim socio-economic rights (such as the rights to housing or transportation), liberty rights (rights against surveillance or police brutality) or group rights (of women or minorities). To complicate matters further, the term has been used by groups as divergent as the homeless, small business owners, and working-class people (Marcuse, 2009). The 'conceptual fuzziness' of the right to the city has been endorsed by many scholars, as '[t]he ability to link the rights of bus riders to those of the homeless or those of welfare recipients must be seen as a strength' (Attoh, 2011: 678). In almost all cases, however, reference to the right to the city includes a demand for democracy and participation. To name only one instance, Dikeç and Gilbert (2002: 58) argue that the right to the city is best described as 'a new societal ethics' which entails that residents are allowed to fully participate in urban society. Finally, good urban governance ideals play an important role and have led to the development of 'toolkits on participatory decision-making, transparency in local governance and participatory budgeting' (Mayer, 2009: 368). The latter, for instance, has been implemented in Porto Alegre and 70 other cities around the world.

For all its vagueness, the right to the city has made its way into a number of (quasi)-legal instruments, such as the European Charter for the Safeguarding of Human Rights in the City adopted in Saint Denis during the Second Conference for European Cities on Human Rights in 2000.⁵ This Charter, which was signed by 400 cities, defines the city as the future of mankind: 'The city today is home to all kinds of assemblies and, above all, a space for personal development. At the same time, it is the locus for contradictions, conflict and danger: The urban space with its anonymity on the one hand is a source of all types of discrimination rooted in unemployment, poverty, and disdain for cultural differences, while simultaneously municipal and social practices are appearing, which increasingly build on the principle of solidarity' (European Conference of Cities for Human Rights, 2000). Within this Charter, the right to the city is set out as follows:

Art. 1 (1): The city is a collective space belonging to all who live in it. These have the right to conditions which allow for their political, social and ecological development, at the same time accepting a commitment to solidarity. Art. 1 (2): The municipal authorities encourage, by all available means, respect for the dignity of all and quality of life of the inhabitants.

In addition to the European Charter, there is a work plan seeking to define a World Charter on Human Rights in the City, among others debated in the World Social Forum. Within these discussions, the right to the city is defined as 'the equitable usufruct of cities within the principles of sustainability, democracy, equity, and social justice' (Ortiz, 2012). Here again the proposed Charter emphasizes both general human rights and a number of specific rights related to the city, considering the city as a sphere for the realization of all human rights, highlighting the social function of the city and calling for its democratic management (Ortiz, 2012). The end goal is the formulation of an instrument that could be adopted by the UN system, regional human rights defenders, and governments as a legal reference in the adoption of the right to the city as a human right. One of the main reasons why the World Charter has not yet come about is severe disagreement on a number of key features, for example, limitation of the scope to that of the city (thus negating, for instance, the popular settlements in which many human rights abuses take place).

Human Rights Cities

The term 'human rights cities' was used first by the NGO The People's Movement for Human Rights Learning (PDHRE), which was founded in 1989 and explicitly takes the Vienna Declaration of 1993 as a point of departure for its work in the field of human rights education and realization. Its central assumption is that learning about human rights, and implementing these insights, can improve society (PDHRE, 2007). It defines a human rights city as a 'city or a community where people of good will, in government, in organizations and in institutions, try and let a human rights framework guide the development of the life of the community' (PDHRE, 2007: 3). In addition, the organization emphasizes the importance of the engagement of all local stakeholders in mobilizing human rights to bring about social change.

In an overview work published in 2008, the organization set out the steps to be taken in the formation of a human rights city, based on insights in the field of participatory community-based research and critical pedagogy: setting up a steering committee representing the main sectors of society, drafting a plan of action that links community priorities to human rights, implementing the work of the human rights city and sharing insights (Marks and Modrowski, 2008). With its emphasis on civic engagement and the transformation of attitudes, the movement explicitly seeks to address and modify local power relations. Since the NGO was founded, dozens of cities worldwide have adopted the title of a human rights city, albeit with very different forms of actual engagement with human rights. In the world's first human rights city, Rosario in Argentina, 35 organizations – uniting indigenous people, human rights organizations, sexual diversity organizations, development bodies, and women’s groups – signed a joint agreement in 1997, resulting in, among other matters, attention to violence against women being part of police training, human rights education, and local activities to ensure the right to a clean environment (PDHRE, 2007). Dozens of human rights cities have followed the PDHRE methodology, ranging from Porte Alegre in Brazil to cities in Ghana, Kenya, Rwanda, Mali, India, Canada, and the Philippines. In addition, Washington, DC adopted a resolution to become a human rights city in 2008, aiming to make the city ‘a model for communities around the world to witness practical ways the human rights framework can make every citizen a partner of sustainable change’.⁶

While the PDHRE proposes a very specific methodology for the formation of human rights cities, more and more cities are adopting the identity of a human rights city without using it. The Korean city of Gwangju, for instance, prides itself on having been at the forefront of advocating democracy, human rights, equality and peace, and having partaken in the uprising against the military dictatorship in 1980.⁷ It organized a conference for 100 human rights cities in 2011, setting up a human rights cities forum and issuing the Gwangju Declaration on Human Rights City.⁸ Similarly, the city of Utrecht – further described below – has adopted the identity of a human rights city without the explicit involvement of the PDHRE.

One of the first European cities to have engaged extensively with the topic was Barcelona, where human rights became part of municipal policies in the early 1990s when Mayor Maragall established the position of the Civil Rights Commissioner, which later became the Civil Rights Department (CRD) of Barcelona (Grigolo, 2011b). The initiative was taken in order to address the consequences of ‘new’ waves of migration and to deal with the increasing racial, ethnic, and religious diversity in the city. In the beginning, the CRD established a number of services such as the Office for Non-Discrimination (OND) and the Office of Religious Affairs (OAR).⁹ The OND, for instance, provides legal services to individuals who want to file a complaint of discrimination against private persons or public bodies (Grigolo, 2011a). The City of Barcelona also ratified the European Charter for the Safeguarding of Human Rights (ECHR) in 2000; the incorporation of ECHR provisions into local ordinances has been on the agenda ever since. Most recently (that is, since 2004), more attention has been paid to women’s and LGBT rights. New municipal services have been established and women’s and LGBT rights have been promoted across all city departments (Grigolo, 2011b). As Grigolo concludes, ‘it is fair to say that Barcelona is a “city of (human) rights” as the RDC and other departments have made a genuine effort to safeguard human rights’ (Grigolo, 2011a: 7). The promotion of minority rights and provision of human rights education have been particularly successful; yet the facilitation of human rights across local government in the broad sense, as well as across the city population, can still be improved.

The first European city formally to adopt the identity of a human rights city was Graz, where the municipal council passed a human rights declaration in February 2001. In this document, the Council committed itself to identifying the gaps in human rights protection, to informing citizens about their rights and to taking human rights into account in its actions. A 'Steering Committee' spearheaded by the European Training and Research Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (ETC) of Graz put forward an action plan in 2002, suggesting a number of human rights policies, for instance regarding the protection of migrants, women and elderly people (Schöfer, 2002). The city established the Human Rights Advisory Council in 2007, which has the task of monitoring and evaluating human rights policies and recommending further actions.¹⁰ The fourth report of the Council, published in 2011, focused on four key areas, namely civil and political rights, economic and social rights, children's rights, and women's rights. The authors of the report take a critical attitude in some parts of the report; for instance, in pointing out how the realization of social and economic rights was substantively impaired by political struggles regarding the boundaries of these rights. Nonetheless, the report also mentions positive aspects, such as the successful promotion of neighbourhood and community work and progress in combating homelessness. Finally, Graz has taken steps to encourage actions by private groups and individuals. For instance, it has established a human rights award which is conferred every year, honouring extraordinary initiatives in local human rights promotion.¹¹ Since then, many European cities have followed suit, such as the city of Nuremberg, which relates its identity as a human rights city to its past.

It is striking how many of these human rights cities combine external networking activities with internal action. Nantes in France, for instance, aims to become 'the world capital of human rights'.¹² The most important and visible event is the World Forum on Human Rights in Nantes, which is organized every two or three years by the International Permanent Secretariat Human Rights and Local Governments (SPIDH). The SPIDH, set up as a French organization in 2007, receives 'moral and financial support' from the City of Nantes, the Urban Community of Nantes, and regions of Western Loire and Loire-Atlantique (SPIDH). The 4th World Forum in 2010, which attracted 2,800 participants, discussed a variety of issues, from slavery to food security, in the light of the responsibility of local governments. These activities are coupled with local initiatives. Most notably, Nantes has created various citizens' councils such as the Nantes Councils for Youth, the Citizenship of Foreigners, and Handicapped People. These Councils provide a number of services (such as newsletters or information about access to justice) and function as platforms through which citizens can initiate projects and communicate with the local authorities. Furthermore, the Mayor of Nantes actively promoted non-discrimination in public service in a Charter on Diversity and Gender Balance in 2007. Finally, members of the local government, such as Deputy Mayor Ayrault and human rights councillor Cécile De Oliveira, have taken symbolic action in the defense of human rights such as raising the Tibetan flag from a window of the town hall.¹³

United Cities and Local Government

Apart from these cities which explicitly identify themselves as human rights cities, there are more and more local government networks seeking to incorporate human rights in their activities. One important movement in this field is the United Cities and Local Government (UCLG) network, consisting of over 1,000 cities and 112 local government associations worldwide, which has been described as 'probably the biggest umbrella association of local governments in the world' (Blank, 2006: 922). Headquartered in Barcelona, the mission of UCLG is '[t]o be the united voice and world advocate of democratic local self-government, promoting its values, objectives and interests, through cooperation between local governments, and within the wider international community' (UCLG, 2012).

UCLG was established in 2004, merging three organizations: the International Union of Local Authorities (IULA), the United Towns Organization, and the 'Metropolis' network (Saunier, 2009). The IULA had existed since 1913, when it was created at the First International Congress of Cities and Compared Exhibition of Cities. Strongly embedded in socialist networks in the first half of the 20th century, the IULA functioned 'as a mouthpiece for self-government and a documentation network to share municipal policies and technological information' (Saunier, 2009). As its location moved to The Hague after the Second World War, the Union tried to expand its scope beyond Europe, providing information about best municipal practices through installation, training, and demonstration projects. At the same time it established links with the UN, which used the IULA to create local governance institutions such as the International Council for Local Environment Initiative (1990), the Cities Alliance Program (1999), and the United Nations Committee of Local Authorities (1999). The merger of the IULA with the two other networks expanded the network of cities but did not end the competition to represent the voice of local government, as other local government organizations continue to exist (Saunier, 2009). UCLG retains 'consultative status' as a non-governmental organization in the UN and regional organizations, and has thus to be contrasted with formal arrangements such as UN Habitat (Feyter et al., 2011: 99).

The legal framework of UCLG is clearly influenced by international human rights instruments. The UCLG Constitution recalls the Universal Declaration in its preamble, stating also that 'the will of the people is the basis of the authority of government' (The Constitution of the World Organisation of United Cities and Local Governments, 2004). It further recognizes that local governments play 'a vital role' in the realization of human rights as they are stated in international instruments. Combating race and gender inequality, as well as other forms of illegal discrimination, is explicitly mentioned as one of the objectives in Article 3 of the Constitution. Moreover, different branches of UCLG, such as its Committee on Culture, have looked closer into some of the problems of human rights. For instance, it discussed the relationship between human rights and culture in Agenda 21 for Culture (UCLG's Committee on Culture, 2004).

The promotion of human rights is only one of the topics treated by the UCLG; nevertheless, it has increasingly referred to human rights and the city over the years, giving its support for instance to the process of formulating the World Charter on Human Rights in the City discussed above.

The Case of Europe: The European Union and The Council of Europe

In addition to individual actors seeking to reclaim and democratize public space under the heading of the right to the city and local governmental networks such as the UCLG explicitly seeking to implement international human rights, there have also been a number of comparable initiatives initiated – primarily – within regional and international organizations. To illustrate this, this contribution will zoom in on one particular region – Europe – and subsequently on one instance of a human rights city: Utrecht.

One European organization with a strong historical interest in strengthening human rights at the local level is the Council of Europe. Over the years, its Congress of Local and Regional Authorities has become increasingly proactive in encouraging human rights, adding this component to its designated mandate of promoting local and regional democracy as well as cooperation between cities and regions.¹⁴ The Commissioner for Human Rights, prominent in the Council of Europe, has come to put more and more emphasis on how a large proportion of human rights work 'should be done locally, close to the people'.¹⁵ In addition, the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities of the Council of Europe has clearly taken up human rights as a central challenge to local government. The 2012 report on 'The state of the Congress', for instance, enumerates the various aspects that the Congress focused upon in promoting human rights in that year. First, it adopted a resolution calling upon local and regional governments to appoint human rights ombudsmen (Council of Europe Congress of Local and Regional Authorities, 2011). Ombudsmen are supposed to facilitate dispute resolution between citizens and local authorities and citizens' access to public institutions. Furthermore, the Congress adopted a strategic action plan in 2011 to mobilize local governments to protect children against exploitation and sexual abuse. It thereby took another step toward the implementation of its 2009 resolution on preventing violence against children. Finally, the Congress also joined a Council of Europe campaign to combat domestic violence, promoting the ratification by Member States of a Convention on the issue. In addition, the 2011 European Local Democracy Week, a pan-European initiative organized by the Council of Europe, had local implementation of human rights as one of its major themes. Within the European Union, the connection between local governments and human rights is increasingly made in the context of the joined-up governance program.¹⁶

As human rights implementation involves both policy-making and public service providence, it represents another field in which joined-up governance (JUG) approaches can be applied. The EU Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA), located in Vienna, Austria, used it in this sense in launching such a project in early 2010. The FRA describes joined-up governance in human rights as 'a strategy that seeks to coordinate the development and implementation of policies and actions across multi-level governance structures, with the aim to address human rights issues in a comprehensive and integrated manner' (FRA, n.d.). According to the FRA, this strategy entails five aspects: first, coordination and partnership between national, regional, and local governments as well as private and public sectors; second, creating awareness of human rights among citizens; third, assessing the impact of human rights implementation; fourth, using already existing EU funding for rights projects; and finally, sharing best human rights practices between local communities and cities (Kjaerum, 2011). All these measures are supposed to bring about 'a comprehensive government delivery in compliance with human rights standards to everybody in society' (FRA, n.d.).

Rather than being a 'movement', JUG in human rights was initiated as an EU policy with the FRA 'in the middle of [the] project' (Kjaerum, 2011). It therefore resembles more of a 'top-down JUG,' which 'refers to initiatives emanating from the authoritative core, usually the political or strategic leadership levels, which flow down to management and service levels' (Keast, 2011: 222). This does not mean, however, that the FRA project cannot gradually evolve into a bottom-up JUG where policy initiatives are taken by the participating cities themselves.

Reference to Specific Rights

Apart from the cities that generally adopt human rights as a policy framework, there are also many cities that opt for basing policies on one particular treaty, thus going further than the standards set nationally.

One example is the way in which San Francisco adopted CEDAW, the Women's Convention, as a local ordinance in 1998. Three years after the Women's Conference in Beijing, and with little hope for its ratification by the US, this law was essentially the result of lobbying efforts on the part of a coalition of community groups led by the Women's Institute for Leadership Development (WILD for Human Rights) (Lozner, 2008). In adopting it, San Francisco agreed to comply to the CEDAW standards of human rights protection, and to establish a CEDAW task force. Over the years, this task force has focused on conducting gender analyses and on thematic areas like violence against women, equal payment of women and their general position in the workplace and science education for girls.¹⁷ It also successfully took initiatives such as citywide gender budgeting. The initiative has led community organizations in New York and Los Angeles to propose local human rights ordinances and to adopt CEDAW and CERD simultaneously at the local level.¹⁸ In addition, dozens of other American cities have passed resolutions supporting the ratification of CEDAW.¹⁹

Another example of cities focusing on one particular human rights issue is the International Coalition of Cities against Racism, an initiative launched by UNESCO in March 2004 to establish a network of cities interested in sharing experiences in order to improve their policies to fight racism, discrimination, xenophobia, and exclusion.²⁰ It is divided into a number of regional coalitions, the first of which was the European Coalition of Cities against Racism (ECCAR), created in December 2004. The overarching aim of the international and regional coalitions is 'to supply local authorities with an operational programme that will allow a more efficient implementation of policies against discrimination' (UNESCO 2005). To this end, the ECCAR adopted a ten-point action plan which included, among other things, setting up a monitoring network to promote equal opportunity practices. The ECCAR includes 104 European municipalities, including Nuremberg (where the ECCAR was created), Krakow, Barcelona, Paris, and Stockholm. Other 'Lead Cities' of regional networks include Casablanca (Arab region), Durban (African region), and Montevideo (Latin America and Caribbean). Taken together, all regional coalitions have more than 300 members, including not only cities but also local government associations. The UNESCO website provides examples of best practices, describing specific projects that cities have implemented in order to fight racism and related discrimination.²¹

THE LEGAL OBLIGATIONS CONCERNED

While an increasing number of local authorities and cities are explicitly basing (part of) their policies on international human rights, there are many others for which human rights hardly constitute a daily point of reference. This raises the question of the extent to which all local authorities have a duty to respect, protect, and fulfill human rights in general policy-making and in individual contact with citizens. Nation-states, of course, are the actors which sign and ratify human rights treaties, and are thus bound to realize the ensuing obligations. But to what extent are local authorities duty bearers in their own right?

The answer to this question depends strongly on the type of right involved and the constitutional dispensation of the country concerned, but one can generally state that international legal obligations also bind local authorities where they are applicable (Meyer, 2009). The general principle behind this is set out in art. 28 of the UDHR: 'Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realized'. Human rights create entitlements to an order that ensures their realization. It is, however, rare for human rights treaties to explicitly hold actors other than State Parties responsible for the rights enshrined in them. One exception is the Convention on the Rights of the Child, art. 3 of which explicitly holds that 'In all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or legislative bodies, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration'.

More often, the way in which the human rights obligations apply to local authorities is set out in case law and general recommendations and country reports by international monitoring bodies. In Assanidze vs Georgia, for instance, the European Court of Human Rights affirmed that

The authorities of a territorial entity of the State are public-law institutions which perform the functions assigned to them by the Constitution and the law. In that connection, the Court reiterates that in international law the expression 'governmental organisation' cannot be held to refer only to the government or the central organs of the State. Where powers are distributed along decentralised lines, it refers to any national authority exercising public functions.²²

This is also clear from the way in which many human rights monitoring bodies directly refer to municipalities and local authorities in their recommendations and country reviews (Meyer, 2009).

While local authorities will, in many cases, be the duty bearers realizing international human rights ranging from the right to privacy to the right to shelter, the mechanisms by which this obligation arises, and can be called in, depend on the type of right involved and the question of whether the country concerned has a monist or a dualist constitutional dispensation. First, there is the question of whether the right involved is justiciable and can thus be invoked by an individual in court or before public authorities. In classical international law doctrine, this mostly concerns civil and political rights, which have over the past years – also increasingly been interpreted as entailing positive obligations. For example, the European Court of Human Rights held the right to life as enshrined in art. 2 to have been violated by local authorities in Turkey that allowed houses to be built on a rubbish heap, resulting in the death of 39 people after a methane explosion. Whereas the Court held that it was not its role to decide the best policy to adopt in dealing with the social, economic, and urban problems in Istanbul, there was a positive obligation to take preventive measures which fell 'precisely within the powers conferred on the authorities'.²³ Similarly, the Supreme Court of India has interpreted the right to life in its constitution as prohibiting, for instance, the eviction of pavement dwellers from the streets of Bombay because this threatened their livelihood (and thus, ultimately, their life).²⁴

Increasingly, however, social and economic rights themselves are considered to have a justiciable 'minimum core content' and to be self-executing in that they allow citizens to pursue claims in a court of law, if needed (Coomans, 2006;

International Council on Human Rights Policy (ICHRP), 2005). The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, for instance, held as early as 1991 that the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights embodies a 'minimum core obligation' with regard to, for instance, essential foodstuffs, primary health care, basic shelter and housing and the most basic forms of education (ICESCR 1991). National courts, most notably in South Africa and India, have also considered other socio-economic rights to have such a minimum core content. Most notably, in the landmark case of Grootboom, the South African Constitutional Court recognized the right of access to adequate housing as a minimum core content of the right to an adequate standard of living in art. 11 ICESCR, and stated that its constitution required the Cape Metropolitan Council to devise and implement within its available resources a comprehensive and coordinated programme to realize progressively the right of access to adequate housing. The Court held that in failing to make reasonable provision within its available resources for people in the Cape Metropolitan area with no access to land and no roof over their heads, and who were living in intolerable conditions or crisis situations, the local government had violated the right of access to adequate housing as enshrined in its constitution.²⁵

The South African ruling was based not only on international human rights law, but also on the national constitution. The degree to which human rights are self-executing, and thus apply directly within a given constitutional order, depends on whether it concerns a monist or a dualist constitutional dispensation. In a monist country such as the Netherlands, the rights do not have to be transposed into national legislation but can – provided that they are considered to be self-executing – be claimed directly (Kummeling, 1995; Elzinga et al., 2008). For instance, in considering the position of an undocumented migrant child and mother who had been evicted in 2011, the Dutch administrative court held that the municipality of Amsterdam had violated article 8 of the ECHR.²⁶ The consequences for municipalities are comparable to the general position of European law within the whole EU. In the landmark Constanzo case, the European Court of Justice stipulated that if provisions have direct effect, all organs of the administration, including decentralized authorities such as municipalities, are obliged to apply those provisions even if there is a clash with, or an absence of, national legislation on the issue concerned (Verhoeven, 2010).²⁷

In countries with a dualist legal system, even rights with direct effect first have to be transposed in national legislation in order to become applicable. One well known and much discussed example of this process is the UK Human Rights Act, art. 6 of which made it unlawful for any public authority to act in a way incompatible with the ECHR. As a result of this Act, the High Court held that a local authority had violated article 8 in failing to find suitable accommodation for a disabled and wheelchair-bound woman, thus confining her to stay in one room.²⁸ Similarly, the introduction of the Irish European Convention of Human Rights Act in 2003 created an obligation for local authorities to comply with the minimum standards of service provision as worked out by the Strasbourg Court in the context of articles 3 and 8 ECHR, and to respect the non-discrimination clause in article 14 ECHR (Kenna, 2010). An even more far-reaching way in which human rights provisions are made applicable at the local level, even if the states concerned have not signed the relevant human rights treaties, is via the type of ordinances discussed above.

THE EXAMPLE OF UTRECHT IN THE NETHERLANDS

Even if international human rights give rise to manifold legal obligations for local governments, this is often not the most important reason to explicitly refer to them in municipal policies (Merry et al., 2010). Individual municipalities can have a variety of motives to engage with human rights, ranging from the search for a common normative language that brings very different groups together and can thus contribute to social cohesion, to the search for a specific urban identity, to dissatisfaction with national (social) policies and legislation and the search for legal grounds to deviate from them. Additionally, explicit engagement with human rights often comes about perchance, on the instigation of individuals with a specific knowledge of and interest in international human rights, whether these are politicians, NGO activists, or influential academics (Davis, 2007). The interplay of these motives and the potentials and pitfalls in becoming a 'human rights city' can be illustrated by looking at one particular city: Utrecht, in the Netherlands.

A university town with more than 300,000 inhabitants of very different backgrounds, this is also the place in which, in 1713, the Treaty of Utrecht put an end to the wars between Spain, France, Portugal, England, and the Seven Provinces. In addition, it is home to the Netherlands Human Rights Institute.²⁹ The city's ambitions to become a human rights city started with a phone call from the FRA Joined-Up Governance project asking whether the mayor would want to speak at a conference on human rights and the city. Although the mayor, a social democrat and former judge, was eventually not available, he was intrigued by the theme and asked the policy department to work on it. As a result, the city joined the FRA Joined-Up Governance project and developed and implemented a number of activities that strengthened its profile as a human rights city.³⁰

The municipal government has a variety of different reasons to explicitly engage with human rights. For one, policymakers consider human rights language as a normative lingua franca, a way to find common ground among the city's 184 nationalities. Bringing the interests and current activities of a wide variety of citizens and organizations together under the general banner of human rights could, it was felt, strengthen these activities and the social cohesion in the city. 'Suddenly the people handing out soup and those pushing someone in a wheelchair are part of one wider process.'³¹ The policy endeavor is thus essentially one of reframing and strengthening existing activities: 'We look what happens in town, and then reframe it in terms of human rights'.³² In the policy discussions on human rights, it is not so much the legal but rather the cultural and discursive elements that are emphasized: 'human rights function as a mirror, a way of looking at ourselves'.³³ Nevertheless, the identity of a human rights city is also considered a form of city branding, a way in which Utrecht can distinguish itself from cities like Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and The Hague.³⁴

One of the first activities undertaken by the municipality as of 2010 was an inventory of the degree to which Utrecht complied with international human rights obligations (Utrecht, 2011). Under the subheading 'An urban quest for social justice,' a final report assessed human rights compliance in a case study in ten different policy fields. In relation to combatting discrimination, for instance, the policy measures in place in Utrecht were not considered adequate by the municipal council. In combatting poverty, the so-called 'U pass' allowing access to sports, culture, and education was presented as a best practice to combat social exclusion. The measures to combat domestic violence and human trafficking and provide shelter to the homeless, as well as the Fair Trade policies, were all presented as best practices. While many schools in Utrecht are 'Peace Schools' and thus technically comply with treaty obligations in the field of human rights education, the research found that the specific connection with human rights was hardly ever made. The report set out how the placement of cameras in public space was in line with treaty obligations, even if it hardly contributed to combating crime. In assessing immigration policies, the report noted how Utrecht's policies went further than national policies, but the city could not provide shelter to all undocumented migrants. Looking at the right to health care for the elderly, the report also pointed out the need for a more culturally sensitive and individualized approach.

Another important emphasis in the city's policies concerned enhancing knowledge of human rights. A first task consisted of conducting research on the topic. Here, it became clear that – not surprisingly – 90 percent of the people in the city found it very important for the municipality to protect human rights. Those considered most important were the rights to equal treatment, freedom of religion, freedom of expression, and education. In addition, the city of Utrecht took the lead in a wide range of initiatives to strengthen municipal attention to human rights nationally and internationally. The Utrecht civil servants also worked with Amnesty International and the Netherlands Association of Municipalities to produce an information brochure on human rights at the local level. Internationally, it organized a series of conferences, including a meeting of the Committee on Social Inclusion, Participatory Democracy and Human Rights of the UCLG, and worked together with cities such as Vienna, Barcelona, Aarhus, Athens, Gothenburg, and London. It also played a key role in the Dutch representation to the Council of Europe Congress of Local and Regional Authorities.

In all these activities, the political side of 'rights talk' was never very far away. The municipality consciously chose both 'left-wing' and 'right-wing' themes for its initial research (immigrant rights and the right to privacy, for instance). When a gay couple was harassed, the national press critically related this to the municipal ambitions in the field of human rights. Also, it became clear that the national government was not entirely enthusiastic about the municipal ambitions.³⁵ For instance, a clear tension arose around the municipal decision to provide shelter to undocumented migrants, even those people who had exhausted all remedies in the asylum procedure. This practice caused political controversy between Strasbourg and the Netherlands in 2009. The national government held that these migrants did not have the right to shelter, but the Committee looking into the implementation of European Social Charter ruled that banning children from shelter in a situation of extreme helplessness was contrary to respect for their humanity and dignity.³⁶ While the national government indicated that it would not comply with the CESC ruling, it was followed by a decision by Utrecht District Court stating that evicting a mother with a young asthmatic and epileptic daughter violated art. 8 ECHR, in combination with art. 17 and 31 of the European Social Charter, the CRC, and CEDAW.³⁷

CONCLUSION AND FUTURE DIRECTIONS

As the international human rights framework has come to emphasize enforcement over standard-setting, and socio-economic rights and positive obligations have come to the forefront, cities have increasingly come into focus as a prime social space for rights realization. This is only enhanced by the increased autonomy that cities have both gained as part of worldwide decentralization policies and claimed in ever-stronger attempts to assert their identity.

It is against this background that the rise of human rights cities should be understood. Ever since the 'right to the city' movement of the 1970s, but especially since the mid-1990s, local governments have started to engage directly with international human rights. At times this concerned bottom-up initiatives, seeking to use human rights learning as an instrument for radical social change, as is the case with the human rights cities that work with the NGO PDHRE. In other cases, such as those in the UCLG network, human rights are primarily considered an instrument to bring about democratic local self-government. International organizations like the EU and the Council of Europe have increasingly started to reach out directly to local authorities in an attempt to implement human rights. Just as often, however, cities sought support for their social policies in (specific) human rights treaties, at times even explicitly departing from national viewpoints.

After all, international human rights law does hold local authorities, as part of government, accountable for the realization of human rights, and both international and national courts have increasingly set out the positive obligations for these authorities in this field. Nevertheless, a closer look at a human rights city such as Utrecht shows that local authorities engaging with international public law have other motivations than purely legal ones. Reference to human rights can form a common language, thereby rallying different people, activities, and interests and strengthening social cohesion within the city; underlining a particular identity, but also strengthening its autonomy vis-à-vis the national government.

Given the global changes set out and the way in which reference to rights can serve a variety of purposes for cities and their citizens alike, the rise of human rights cities will undoubtedly continue in the years to come. Here, it is also important to conduct more research on cities' motives for referring to human rights and the degree to which these ideals are subsequently realized. In addition, the exact legal obligations pertaining to the local realization of human rights in a given context merit much more scholarly attention than they have received to date. Such scholarly scrutiny is important as, with its potential to bind people from very different backgrounds together on the one hand and the permanent threat of politicization on the other, local human rights realization clearly holds the same promises but faces the same challenges as human rights realization on a global scale.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This research has been funded by the Dutch Platform31 and the Interuniversity Attraction Poles Programme initiated by the Belgian Science Policy Office, more specifically the IAP 'The Global Challenge of Human Rights Integration: Towards a Users' Perspective'.

NOTES

1. Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, as adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights on 25 June 1993, A/CONF.157/23, 12 July 1993.
2. Report of the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, Rashida Manjoo, Mission to Italy, A/HRC/20/16/Add.2, 15 June 2012.
3. www.unfpa.org/pds/urbanization.htm
4. European Charter for the Safeguarding of Human Rights in the City, adopted at St Denis, 18 May 2000, available from www.idhc.org/cat/documents/Carta_ingles.pdf. For discussion on the World Charter for the Rights to the City see www.hic-net.org/document.php?pid=2422 (cited 27 September 2012).
5. Ibid.
6. Resolution in the Council of the District of Columbia, via www.pdhre.org
7. www.humanrightscity.net/eng/subpage.php?pagecode=010201
8. See www.humanrightscity.net
9. The number of public human rights agencies in Barcelona has now increased: citizens can also approach the Municipal Office for Civil Rights, the Department for Equality and Citizenship of the Barcelona County Council, the Ombudsman Service of Barcelona, the Ombudsman Service of Catalonia, the Catalonia Civil Law Department of Justice, and the Government of Catalonia (Ajuntament de Barcelona).
10. ETC Graz. 2012. Was ist der Menschenrechtsbeirat? European Training and Research Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (cited 20 June 2012). Available from www.etc-raz.at/typo3/index.php?id=1109

11. Bailloux, Marie. 2012. Graz, City of Human Rights in Europe or the Right to a "Human City" in Europe? Dialogues, proposals, stories for global citizenship 2009 [cited 20 June 2012].
12. Ayrault, J.-M. (2003) Editorial: Nantes, capitale mondiale des Droits de l'homme. Nantes Passion.
13. Ripoché, V. (2012) Le drapeau tibétain flotte sur l'hôtel de ville. MaVille 2008 (cited 21 June 2012) Available from www.nantes.maville.com/actu/actudet_Actualite%C3%A9_606114_actu.Htm
14. The Congress of Local and Regional Authorities of the Council of Europe is a pan-European political assembly which consists of more than 600 members that hold elective office on the local and regional level. The Congress represents over 200,000 authorities in 47 European states.
15. Bringing human rights home: human rights action at the local level. Statement by the Commissioner for Human Rights, Thomas Hammarberg, at the 20th Session of the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities, 22 March 2011, CommDH/Speech\(2011\)33), www.wcd.coe.int
16. The phrase 'joined-up governance' (JUG) was initially established by Tony Blair's New Labour administration in its 'modernization' programme at the end of the 1990s. While the precise meaning of JUG was not clear from the beginning, it was later defined as the aspiration to enhance performance in public administration through coordination of policies, better use of resources, cooperation between different agencies, and integration of public services (Pollitt, 2003). JUG drew on a longer policy tradition in the UK, starting with the Churchill administration, which had sought to coordinate various branches of government in order to reduce cost and improve the quality of public services. Even though JUG did not therefore constitute a novel idea, 'it sounded good – catchy, inclusive, common-sense and sufficiently different from the policies of the defeated Conservatives' (Pollitt, 2003: 36). Since then, the idea of JUG has been taken up by other national and local administrations, for instance in Australia and the United States (Keast, 2011; Lewis et al., 2009). In all cases, JUG describes the effort to achieve either horizontal or vertical integration in public management.
17. www.sfgov.org
18. www.nychri.org/
19. www.wedo.org/wp-content/uploads/cedaw-factsheet.pdf
20. UNESCO. 2012. International Coalition of Cities against Racism (cited 6 June 2012). Available from www.unesco.org/new/en/social-and-human-sciences/themes/fight-against-discrimination/coalition-of-cities/
21. www.unesco.org/new/en/social-and-human-sciences/themes/fight-against-discrimination/coalition-of-cities/good-practices/
22. Assanidze v. Georgia [ECHR], Application no. 71503/01, 8 April 2004.
23. Oneryildiz v. Turkey [ECHR], Application no. 48939/99, 30 November 2004.
24. Olga Tellis v. Bombay Municipal Corporation (Supreme Court of India), 10 July 1985.
25. Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others v. Grootboom and Others (Constitutional Court of South Africa), 4 October 2000.
26. Central Appeals Tribunal, 30 May 2011, LJN: BQ6438, 11/2850 WMO-VV + 11/3201 WMO-VV.
27. Fratelli Costanzo SpA v. Comune di Milano [ECJ], ECR 1839, 22 June 1989.
28. R. (Bernard) v. Enfield L.B.C. (High Court of England and Wales), 2282 (Admin). 2002.
29. www.mensenrechten.nl/
30. www.fra.europa.eu/fraWebsite/research/projects/proj_joinedupgov_en.htm and www.humanrightstrecht.blogspot.nl/
31. Presentation H. Sakkars., Conference 'Bringing Human Rights Home', Middelburg, 2 December 2011, notes B. Oomen
32. Meeting NGOs and policy makers, Utrecht, 13 January 2012, notes B. Oomen.
33. Interview, Utrecht, 22 September 2010.
34. Amsterdam bases its social policies strongly on the Rawlsian notion of civility, whereas The Hague manifests itself as City of Peace and Justice (and home to a variety of international organizations).
35. Private conversation, Amsterdam, 7 March 2012, notes B. Oomen.
36. European Committee of Social Rights, Defence for Children v. the Netherlands, 20 October 2009, 47/2008.
37. Utrecht District Court, 6 April 2010, LJN: BM0846.

REFERENCES

- Attoh, K.A. (2011) 'What Kind of Right is the Right to the City?', Progress in Human Geography, 35(5): 669–685.
- Blank, Y. (2006) 'The City and the World,' Columbia Journal of Transnational Law, 44(3): 875–939.
- Coomans, F. (2006) Justiciability of Economic and Social Rights: Experiences from Domestic Systems. Antwerp & Maastricht: Intersentia & Maastricht Centre for Human Rights.
- Council of Europe Congress of Local and Regional Authorities (2011) State of the Congress, Speech held at the CoE, Strasbourg, 18 October 2011, CG(21)20, www.wcd.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?id=1852657 (accessed 23 March 2014).
- Davis, M. (2007) 'Thinking Globally, Acting Locally: States, Municipalities, and International Human Rights,' in C. Soohoo et al. (eds.), Bringing Human Rights Home: a History of Human Rights in the United States. Pennsylvania: University of Pennsylvania Press, pp. 258–286.
- Dikeç, M. and Gilbert, L. (2002) 'Right to the City: Homage or a New Societal Ethics?' Capitalism Nature Socialism, 13(2): 58–74.
- Elzinga, D.J., De Lange, R. and Hoogers, H.H.G. (2008) Handboek van het Nederlandse Staatsrecht. Deventer: Kluwer.
- European Conference of Cities for Human Rights (2000) European Charter for the Safeguarding of Human Rights in the City. Saint Denis. www.uclg-cisdg.org/en/right-to-the-city/european-charter (accessed 23 March 2014)
- Feyter, K. de, Parmentier, S., Timmerman, C. and Ulrich, G. (2011) The Local Relevance of Human Rights. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- FRA (n.d.) Connecting Rights: A Joined-up Governance Approach to Fundamental Rights Implementation. European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights. www.fra.europa.eu/en/joinedup/home
- Grigolo, M. (2011a) 'Incorporating Cities into the EU Anti-discrimination Policy: between Race Discrimination and Migrant Rights,' Ethnic and Racial Studies, 34(1): 1751–1769.
- Grigolo, M. (2011b) 'Building the "City of Rights": The Human Rights Policy of Barcelona,' United Cities and Local Governments [Online], available at www.michele-grigolo.com/publication_843.html (accessed 12 August 2012).
- Harvey, D. (2012) Rebel Cities: From the Right to the City to the Urban Revolution. London and New York: Verso.
- ICESCR (1991), General Comment 3: The Nature of States Parties Obligations, E/1991/23 (Supp), 1 January 1991.
- ICHRP (2005) Local Government and Human Rights: Doing Good Service. Versoix: International Council on Human Rights Policy.
- Kavaratzis, M. (2004) 'From City Marketing to City Branding: Towards a Theoretical Framework for Developing City Brands,' Place Branding, 1(1): 58–73.
- Keast, R. (2011) 'Joined-Up Governance in Australia: How the Past Can Inform the Future,' International Journal of Public Administration, 34(4): 221–231.
- Kenna, P. (2010) 'Local Authorities and the European Convention on Human Rights Act 2003,' Irish Human Rights Law Review, 1: 111–141.
- Kjaerum, M. (2011) International Human Rights – Local Delivery: Why a joined-up approach to human rights implementation is essential (speech given by Morten Kjaerum, Director of the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights on 24 March, Graz). European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, www.fra.europa.eu/en/speech/2013/international-human-rights-local-delivery-why-joined-up-approach-human-rights (accessed 23 March 2014).
- Kummeling, H.R.B.M. (1995) 'International recht in de Nederlandse rechtsorde: Over een onduidelijke grondwet(gever) en verwarrende jurisprudentie,' in Ten Berge, J.B.J.M and Burkens, M.C.B. (eds.), De Grondwet als voorwerp van aanhoudende zorg. Zwolle: Tjeenk Willink, pp. 369–385.
- Lefebvre, H. (1996) 'The Right to the City,' in Kofman, E. and Lebas, E. (eds.), Writings on Cities. London: Blackwell, pp. 63–184.

- Lewis, B.L., Boulihanis, J. and Matherly, E. (2009) 'Joined-Up Governance: Mandated Collaboration in US Homeless Services,' International Journal of Public Sector Management, 22(5): 392-399.
- Lozner, S.L. (2008) 'Diffusion of Local Regulatory Innovations: The San Francisco CEDAW Ordinance and the New York City Human Rights Initiative,' Columbia Law Review, 104(3): 768-800.
- Parcuse, P. (2009) 'From Critical Urban Theory to the Right to the City,' City, 13(2-3): 185-197.
- Marks, S.P. and Modrowski, K.A. (2008) Human Rights Cities: Civic Engagement for Societal Development. New York: UN Habitat.
- Mayer, F.C. and Palmowski, J. (2004) 'European Identities and the EU - The Ties that Bind the Peoples of Europe,' The Journal of Common Market Studies, 42(3): 573-598.
- Mayer, M. (2009) 'The "Right to the City" in the Context of Shifting Mottos of Urban Social Movements,' City, 13(2-3): 362-374.
- Merry, S.E., Rosen, M.S., Levitt, P. and Yoon, D. (2010), 'Law from Below: Women's Human Rights and Social Movements in New York City,' Law & Society Review, 44(1): 101-128.
- Meyer, A. (2009) 'Local Governments & Human Rights Implementation: Taking Stock and a Closer Strategic Look,' Pace Diritti Umani, 6(3): 7-23.
- Mitchell, D. (2003) The Right to the City: Social Justice and the Fight for Public Space. London: The Guilford Press.
- Ortiz, E. (2012) 'Toward a World Charter for the Right to the City,' Habitat International Coalition [Online], available at www.hic-net.org/articles.php?pid=2296 (accessed 6 June 2012).
- Otto, J.M. and Ferks, G. (1996) Decentralization and Development: A Review of Development Administration Literature. Leiden: Van Vollenhoven Institute.
- Paddison, R. (1993) 'City Marketing, Image Reconstruction and Urban Regeneration,' Urban Studies, 30(2): 2339-2349.
- PDHRE (2007) Human Rights Learning and Human Rights Cities: Achievements Report [Online], available from www.pdhre.org/achievements-HR-cities-mar-07.pdf (accessed 12 August 2012).
- Plyusheva, A. (2009) 'The Right to the City and Struggles over Urban Citizenship: Exploring the Links,' Amsterdam Social Science, 3(1): 81-97.
- Pollitt, C. (2003) 'Joined-up Government: A Survey,' Political Studies Review, 1(1): 34-49.
- Saunier, P.Y. (2009) 'United Cities and Local Government' [Online], available at www.palgrave.com/history/transnational/docs/UCLG%20sample%20final.doc (accessed 31 May 2012).
- Schöfer, E. (2002) Graz: Erste Menschenrechtsstadt Europas, European Training and Research Centre for Human Rights and Democracy, Graz, www.etc-graz.at/typo3/fileadmin/user_upload/ETC-Hauptseite/publikationen/Occasional_papers/Bestandsaufnahme.pdf (accessed 23 March 2014).
- UCLG Committee on Culture (2004) 'Agenda 21 for Culture', available from www.agenda21culture.net/index.php/documents/agenda-21-for-culture (accessed 17 May 2014).
- UCLG (2012) 'United Cities and Local Governments' [Online], available at www.cities-localgovernments.org/ (accessed 31 May 2012).
- UNESCO (2005) 'The European Coalition of Cities Against Racism,' International Social Science Journal, 57(183): 175-183.
- Utrecht (2011) Human Rights in Utrecht: How does Utrecht Give Effect to International Human Rights Treaties? An Urban Quest for Social Justice, Utrecht, www.utrecht.nl/images/Secretarie/Internationaal/pdf/Human%20Rights%20in%20Utrecht%20English%20\(June%202011\).pdf.pdf) (accessed 23 March 2014)
- Verhoeven, M. (2010) 'The "Costanzo Obligation" and the Principle of National Institutional Autonomy: Supervision as a Bridge to Close the Gap?' Review of European Administrative Law, 3(1): 23-64.