Setting the Scene: The Rise of EU Law Enforcement Authorities

MICHIEL LUCHTMAN

I. Introduction

Direct enforcement by European Union (EU) authorities is one of the major developments in the European enforcement landscape.<sup>1</sup> June 2021 saw the start of operations of the European Public Prosecutor's Office (EPPO), without a doubt one of the most ambitious projects in the area of criminal justice. New plans for an European anti-money laundering agency have recently been launched.<sup>2</sup> The trend, however, undoubtedly has its roots in administrative law. An increasing number of EU policy areas are now enforced by EU authorities. Unlike in previous decades, where the role of EU institutions was to monitor the enforcement activities of national authorities, EU authorities have now themselves become entrusted with the monitoring of compliance with EU rules and regulations by individuals and other private actors, with investigations into alleged breaches of these norms and with the sanctioning of established breaches, including sanctioning through punitive (pecuniary) sanctions.<sup>3</sup> This inherently means that the EU's operational mandates and powers have entered further into the domain of national enforcement competences and the administration of criminal justice.

This development was not the result of an overarching 'grand design'. One can safely assume that these developments have been largely sector-specific or path-dependent.<sup>4</sup> Punitive enforcement is often put in the hands of EU authorities that were already entrusted with regulatory, supervisory and/or indirect enforcement tasks. Direct enforcement then presents a next, logical step in cases where law enforcement by national authorities proves inadequate. These largely sectoral developments also explain why there are significant differences in the institutional frameworks of the authorities involved. These differences relate to, for instance, whether or not the enforcement activities take place in an 'open environment', where no supervisory EU enforcement regimes exist (such as in competition law or the area of the protection of the EU's financial interests (PIF)), or whether they are preceded by highly harmonised supervisory regimes, such as in the financial sector. There are also significant differences in the persons that are the object of investigations. Banking supervision is mainly exercised over legal persons, often multinational financial institutions with significant economic weight. That is different in the PIF area, where investigations by the European Anti-Fraud Office (OLAF) also cover natural persons. All of these and other differences have an impact on the institutional choices that have been made, as well as on the threats and opportunities with which the EU authorities, citizens and undertakings are confronted.

However, the path-dependent logic of these developments does not mean that one should close one's eyes to the general, cross-sectoral trend towards direct enforcement and the commonalities and questions faced by all of the EU authorities involved. To the best of my knowledge, there has not been a broader debate on the institutional and constitutional implications of this shift towards direct enforcement for legal protection in cases of EU enforcement action, for the protection of fundamental rights in this transnational and supranational setting, nor, more generally, for its relationship with the domain of national criminal justice. The logic and speed by which existing authorities with regulatory or supervisory tasks now become entrusted with operational enforcement tasks conceal an important doctrinal shift in legal thinking on law enforcement and its traditional focus on the nation-state context. One of the common features of all EU enforcement authorities is their European-wide operational mandate. These authorities are no longer dependent on traditional, international law rules for mutual administrative or legal assistance in cross-border cases. Instead, part of the efficiency gains for which their institutional frameworks strive is precisely the removal of these elements of international law from their legal frameworks for the benefit of shared operational goals, policies and informal types of enforcement cooperation. In and of itself, these are major legal innovations.<sup>5</sup>

In this chapter, I intend to connect the notion of law enforcement to the notion of the EU and its Member States as a composite institutional, or perhaps even constitutional, entity. Within this composite legal order, the tasks and competences of the EU authorities are capable of, on the one hand, connecting and integrating the legal orders of the participating Member States and their authorities into an enforcement design that cannot build, on the other hand, on the narrative of the nation-state with respect to arrangements for fundamental rights, legal protection or political accountability.<sup>6</sup>

A new narrative is needed for that, yet it remains under-studied, and this in an area of law where interferences with the legal position of individuals are particularly intrusive. Existing studies on EU regulatory governance provide valuable input<sup>7</sup> yet do not take full account of the specifics of law enforcement as such. Vice versa, national debates on law enforcement still remain focused predominantly on the setting of the nation-state. The role and position of national enforcement actors, including courts, as part of the larger European project remain under-studied and do not appear to have a prominent place on the political and legislative agendas in the EU's Member State capitals.

To study law enforcement as a composite affair does justice to empirical reality. It illustrates how the significance of national borders and, consequently, the principles and vocabulary of international law in cross-border cases have been deliberately mitigated or even removed from the institutional frameworks of the EU authorities and their national partners. The notion of composite enforcement consequently also has normative implications. It sheds light on a number of blind spots in the current enforcement designs of the competent authorities that need attention in light of the effective enforcement of EU law, as well as effective legal protection. Composite enforcement stresses that law enforcement by EU authorities is not a derivative of national enforcement, nor can it be regarded as an exclusively European affair. Composite enforcement includes and connects – and should connect – all three traditional branches of government, at the EU as well as at the national levels.

In the subsequent sections of this chapter, I will first briefly introduce three of the administrative actors of our previous studies (section II) and will then elaborate further on the notion of the EU and its Member States as a composite legal order (section III). As a more specific form of compositeness, section IV will subsequently explain what is meant by composite administrative enforcement procedures, as well as why the relationship with national criminal justice is so important for them. I will conclude with the consequences of all this for the approach and subsequent chapters in this book (section V).

Though the EPPO was never a part of our previous studies, we have included a separate chapter on this important new actor as well, in which we highlight the relevance of the main findings of our previous work to this new actor in the domain of criminal justice.<sup>8</sup> That is also why some introductory remarks on the EPPO have been made in the next section of this chapter.

II. Punitive Enforcement by EU Authorities: Four Case Studies

As said in the Introduction to this volume, this book's methodology builds upon a comparison of four EU authorities and their integration into a number of national legal orders. These authorities were OLAF, the Directorate-General for Competition

<sup>7</sup> See, for instance, M Busuioc, The Accountability of European Agencies: Legal Provisions and Ongoing Practices (Utrecht University 2010).

(DG Competition), the European Securities and Markets Authority (ESMA)<sup>9</sup> and the European Central Bank (ECB) in relation to the Single Supervisory Structure (SSM). As noted, another EU enforcement authority has meanwhile entered the scene. The EPPO will be responsible for the investigation, prosecution and bringing to judgment by national courts of criminal offences against the EU's financial interests. It goes without saying that all of these authorities operate in different areas of EU policy and have different mandates and powers. Before answering the question of why a comparison is nonetheless necessary and fruitful, it is good to introduce these actors in brief, as the following chapters will also build upon this comparison.

A. OLAF

In the area of the protection of the financial interests of the EU, OLAF and the EPPO are key players. OLAF is a Commission directorate with a dual task.<sup>10</sup> It has a policy function, but it is also an operational body, entrusted with carrying out external administrative investigations in the Member States or internal administrative investigations within the European institutions. It is independent when it comes to its investigative tasks. Its mandate covers both the expenditure side of the EU and the income side. Value added tax, though part of the EU's budget, is not, however, within its operational competences, or at least that is still disputed.<sup>11</sup>

OLAF is an administrative office, with administrative powers, that combats fraud and related activities.<sup>12</sup> The Office operates at the brink of administrative law and criminal law. OLAF itself is an investigative body. It is not competent to commence procedures for fraud or recovery. Those procedures are the responsibility of other actors, at the EU level (including the EPPO) or at the national level. The follow-up may be of a punitive nature (including criminal procedures), but that is not necessarily the case. In fact, many OLAF cases end in disciplinary or recovery procedures. This highlights the Office's complicated institutional position. It is highly dependent on partner institutions at the national and the European levels to realise an effective fight against EU fraud. That means OLAF needs to cooperate with a wide variety of partners, as national legal orders are organised in very different ways. In some cases, it is not even clear precisely which national authority is OLAF's partner. This is why a network of Anti-Fraud Coordination Services (AFCOS) was introduced, to enable OLAF to do its work more effectively. Yet, as it has turned out, these AFCOS also show great differences in their design and powers.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>12</sup>See Regulation No 883/2013 of 11 September 2013 concerning investigations conducted by the European Anti-Fraud Office (OLAF) [2013] OJ L248/1, as recently amended by Regulation 2020/2223 of 23 December 2020, as regards cooperation with the European Public Prosecutor's Office and the effectiveness of the European Anti-Fraud Office investigations [2020] OJ L437/49.

OLAF's legal position is complicated further by its fragmented legal framework and instruments. It can conduct external investigations autonomously, or coordinate procedures between competent national authorities.<sup>14</sup> Under the former heading, it may conduct on-the-spot checks.<sup>15</sup> Though OLAF's framework has been strengthened recently, to the extent that it will be less dependent on national law in cases of cooperation by the economic actor under investigation, it remains dependent on national law and its national partners in cases of non-cooperation by those actors.<sup>16</sup> OLAF is not allowed to use physical force or to impose fines in cases of non-cooperation. Moreover, when it conducts its investigations, it needs to take account of a number of safeguards that are reminiscent of criminal procedures, though OLAF itself has no powers to initiate criminal charges.

A particular problem for OLAF is, as said, the follow-up of its work at the national level. The OLAF Regulation requires the competent authorities of the Member State concerned to take 'such action as the results of the external investigation warrant' and to report back to the Office.<sup>17</sup> Of course, the question is to what extent a provision like this is now capable of binding national authorities to specific further action. That finding is relevant for future actions for annulment, which may be launched by persons that are affected by OLAF investigations. As is well known, the Court of Justice has thus far rejected most OLAF cases under Article 263 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU).<sup>18</sup> Recent case law seems to suggest, impliedly, that this will not change with the entry into force of the new Regulation.<sup>19</sup>

The rules on the admissibility of evidence in national proceedings were also recently changed.<sup>20</sup> OLAF reports shall constitute admissible evidence in judicial proceedings of a non-criminal nature before national courts and in administrative proceedings in the Member States. For criminal procedures, the rules remain complicated, as they do under the new Regulation.<sup>21</sup> Reports are admissible when their use proves necessary in the same way and under the same conditions as administrative reports drawn up by national administrative inspectors, and shall be subject to the same evaluation rules as those applicable to administrative reports drawn up by national administrative inspectors and shall have the same evidentiary value as such reports. In effect, this rule bridges two gaps at once, that is, a transfer of the report from the EU jurisdiction to the national one and from an administrative to a criminal procedure.

B. DG Competition

Another enforcement directorate of the European Commission is DG Competition.<sup>22</sup> Like OLAF, it operates in what one could call an open context. It is entrusted with market surveillance in light of Articles 101 and 102 TFEU. Consequently, like OLAF, it has no specific legal relationships with private undertakings when it commences its investigations. Its task is to seek and find, together with national competition authorities, infringements of the said articles and to ensure that undertakings terminate those infringements. The Commission may also impose punitive fines for violations of Articles 101 and 102 TFEU.<sup>23</sup>

The operation of the system of enforcement of EU competition law is based on a decentralised model. Whereas competition law was previously enforced by the Commission itself, the large reforms of 2003 saw the introduction of a decentralised model within which the Commission and national competition authorities (NCAs) enforce EU competition rules in close cooperation.<sup>24</sup> Infringements of EU competition rules will therefore certainly not always be investigated by the Commission, though the Commission has the right to intervene in pending national procedures.<sup>25</sup> That explains the need for continuous mutual consultation and coordination via the European Competition Network in which DG Competition and NCAs participate. In those situations, NCAs apply EU competition rules, as well as the standards of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights.<sup>26</sup> In addition to this, NCAs enforce national competition rules.

The relationship between national and European competition law is complicated. Though both types of competition law are considered to protect different legal values, there will be overlap and, hence, potential for conflict in specific cases. It was for this reason that the rules on the national enforcement of Articles 101 and 102 TFEU and those on the parallel application of national competition laws were recently harmonised by a Directive having both Article 103 TFEU and Article 114 TFEU as its legal basis.<sup>27</sup> The ECN+ Directive aligns the institutional position of the NCAs and their powers with those of DG Competition.

The investigative powers of DG Competition are laid down in Articles 17–22 of Regulation 1/2003. They include the powers to request (voluntary) statements and to obtain information, but also to conduct on-site inspections ('dawn raids'). The inspection powers cover not only business premises, but also, under certain extra conditions, private homes.<sup>28</sup> As an alternative, DG Competition may also request the national authorities to perform investigative measures on its behalf.<sup>29</sup> It cannot exercise physical coercion itself in case of non-cooperation. For that, it needs the assistance of national authorities. It does have the power, however, to impose administrative sanctions, including punitive sanctions, for non-cooperation. Coercion, therefore, is not a Commission power, but compulsion is.

The EU competition rules do not pay much attention to procedural safeguards and the rights of the defence. These have been elaborated mainly by case law and were, occasionally, subsequently implemented in the legislative framework. Nonetheless, Regulation 1/2003 does provide for rules on the admissibility of evidence in competition procedures. Article 12 stipulates, for the purposes of applying Articles 81 and 82 TFEU, a rule of mutual admissibility of evidence. Additional conditions apply, however, when information is used for the application of national competition law or when used against natural persons. In the latter case, the information exchanged can be used in evidence to impose sanctions only where

- the law of the transmitting authority foresees sanctions of a similar kind in relation to an infringement of Article 81 or Article 82 of the Treaty or, in the absence thereof,
- the information has been collected in a way which respects the same level of protection of the rights of defence of natural persons as provided for under the national rules of the receiving authority. However, in this case, the information exchanged cannot be used by the receiving authority to impose custodial sanctions.<sup>30</sup>

It goes without saying that this provision can have significant repercussions for criminal law enforcement of competition law and related offences.

C. The ECB and the SSM Framework

In the wake of the financial crisis of 2007–08, the enforcement tasks of the ECB (and other EU authorities on the financial markets) have been widened considerably. Banking supervision, and the punitive enforcement thereof, is of a different nature than the open context within which OLAF and DG Competition operate. Banks and other financial institutions are subject to a largely harmonised set of EU rules that generally require prior authorisation by financial supervisors, before those institutions are allowed to enter the markets and offer financial services to customers. Once allowed to be active, EU and national implementing rules provide for a detailed set of prudential and ‘conduct-of-business’ rules to be monitored by the supervisory authority (the so-called ‘single rule book’). This is a continuous process in which banks and their supervisors constantly exchange information. Most supervisors consequently emphasise a relationship of trust with the financial institutions as being essential for their effective operation. At times, this position may be at odds with the power of that same supervisor to impose punitive sanctions or refer cases for criminal investigation and prosecution. Nonetheless, these powers exist and have on occasion also been used.

As an essential pillar of the EU's banking union, the Single Supervisory Mechanism (SSM) appoints the ECB as the central prudential supervisor of financial institutions in the euro area and in non-euro EU countries that chose to join the SSM.<sup>31</sup> Under this framework, the ECB directly supervises the largest banks (so-called 'significant entities'), while the national supervisory authorities monitor the so-called 'less significant entities'. In the execution of their tasks, the ECB and the national supervisors work closely together to ensure that banks comply with the EU banking rules.

The structure of the SSM system is such that there are no parallel competences within the system, unlike in the competition network. The supervisory competences of the ECB and national banks are, under the oversight of the ECB, mutually exclusive. This structure, with the ECB clearly in the lead, does not mean that the national authorities have been removed from the ECB's operations. In practice, national banks and their officials still play a significant role as part of the ECB's supervision and enforcement structures. For instance, national officials are part of the ECB's joint supervisory teams, acting as functional agents of the ECB, applying the ECB's legal regime. A specific innovation of the SSM regime is that the ECB is also called upon to apply national implementing laws, that is, the material banking laws of that state.<sup>32</sup>

The supervisory and investigatory powers of the ECB have been laid down in SSM Regulation 1024/2013. These very much resemble the powers of DG Competition, and include the power to request information and to conduct investigations on site. However, unlike DG Competition, the ECB has no powers to enter private homes. Non-cooperation is often punishable with a fine or penalty payment. The powers are available to the ECB during all stages of the procedures, from the stage of monitoring, to the investigation of violations of EU law, to the stage of punitive sanctioning. Moreover, the ECB can call in the assistance of the national competent authorities (NCAs) and instruct them to use any additional investigatory powers they may have under national law.<sup>33</sup> National authorities may also be called upon to offer assistance in cases where physical coercion is needed.

The ECB has direct sanctioning powers on the basis of Article 18(1) and (7) of the SSM Regulation.<sup>34</sup> These powers entail the imposition of punitive sanctions (particularly fines) in cases where norm violations are based on directly applicable EU law, that is Regulation No 575/2013<sup>35</sup> and other technical standards. Moreover, the ECB can require the NCAs to commence proceedings in other cases.<sup>36</sup> National competent authorities are competent, at least under the prevailing opinion, for the sanctioning of violations of norms contained in Directive 2013/36/EU,<sup>37</sup> which consequently must be implemented in national law. This indirect sanctioning power of the ECB does not mean, however, that the ECB can also require NCAs to achieve a certain result in this respect.<sup>38</sup>

<sup>31</sup> Regulation No 1024/2013 of 15 October 2013 conferring specific tasks on the European Central Bank concerning policies relating to the prudential supervision of credit institutions [2013] OJ L287/63, and Regulation No 468/2014 of the European Central Bank of 16 April 2014 establishing the framework for cooperation within the Single Supervisory Mechanism between the European Central Bank and national competent authorities and with national designated authorities (SSM Framework Regulation) [2014] OJ L141/1.

As is also the case for DG Competition, procedural safeguards and defence rights have only been dealt with in passing in the SSM framework.<sup>39</sup> The obvious conflict between the ECB's powers of investigation and the rights of the defence in punitive procedures is, for instance, left untouched. The general assumption is that for banking supervision, where legal persons are the supervised entities, the Court's case law in competition law procedures is to be applied mutatis mutandis. The ECB framework contains no rule on the admissibility of evidence gathered in one jurisdiction (including the EU's) and subsequently introduced in another.

The relationship with actors in the area of criminal justice is a particularly sensitive one in banking supervision. Criminal proceedings against banks, if possible at all, may indeed have very negative consequences for the reputation and operations of the particular bank. The fact remains, however, that criminal prosecution for violations of banking supervision rules or related offences, such as anti-money laundering offences, is possible in a number of Member States. The coordination of procedures and mutual exchange of information with national criminal justice authorities is therefore an issue that cannot be overlooked in the punitive enforcement of banking regulations. The topic is dealt with in passing in the ECB's legal framework<sup>40</sup> and in more detail in Decision 2016/1162 on the disclosure of confidential information for criminal investigations.<sup>41</sup> The latter Decision reveals that information exchanges between the ECB's national partners and criminal justice bodies are possible, subject to the ECB's oversight of the NCAs. Yet clearly, this Decision leaves open a great number of issues, such as the coordination of punitive procedures and the nature and degree of the ECB's oversight. Moreover, the conflict that may occur between criminal powers of investigation and a supervisor's duty of secrecy, and which is dealt with differently in the participating Member States, is not touched upon.<sup>42</sup>

D. A Brief Outlook: The EPPO

Though the EPPO was not part of our previous studies, it does present a development that is too important to be left undiscussed. The position of the EPPO is unique to the extent that, as an EU organ, it is empowered to prosecute criminal cases before national criminal courts. Under the framework of the EPPO Regulation,<sup>43</sup> the EPPO shall be responsible for investigating, prosecuting and bringing to judgment the perpetrators of, and accomplices to, criminal offences affecting the financial interests of the Union that are provided for in the so-called PIF Directive.<sup>44</sup> It undertakes acts of criminal prosecution and exercises the functions of prosecutor in the competent courts of the Member States. Within the scope of its mandate ratione materiae, the EPPO shares its competences with national prosecutors, though it has a certain priority competence within the limits of the Regulation.

The EPPO is an indivisible Union body, operating as a single office. However, the organisational structure of this EU organ is complicated. The EPPO is composed of two levels – a central level in Luxembourg and a decentralised level, consisting of the European Delegated Prosecutors (EDPs) within the 22 participating Member States. The central level consists of a European Chief Prosecutor, who is the head of the EPPO as a whole and the head of the College of European Prosecutors, the Permanent Chambers and the European Prosecutors. The general strategic and policy issues are for the central level; the operational work is done by the delegated prosecutors, whose operational competence is limited to the territory of their jurisdiction of origin. The EDPs act on behalf of the EPPO in their respective Member States and have the same powers as national prosecutors in respect of investigations, prosecutions and bringing cases to judgment.<sup>45</sup> Their limited territorial mandate also means that for cross-border cases, cooperation with delegated prosecutors from other Member States remains a necessity.<sup>46</sup> In other words, there is no concept of European territoriality.

The EDPs wear a double hat; though they are functionally a part of the EPPO for their EPPO work, they are also national prosecutors and allowed to act in that capacity, as long as this does not interfere with their work for the EPPO.<sup>47</sup> They work under the supervision of so-called permanent chambers that supervise and coordinate the investigations. Once the decision has been taken to seize a criminal court, it is the delegated prosecutor who acts before the national court as prosecutor in the case.

As the work of the EPPO will usually involve multiple participating states,<sup>48</sup> the Regulation has designed a system of case allocation. A case shall as a rule be initiated and handled by a European delegated prosecutor from the Member State where the focus of the criminal activity is, or, if several connected offences within the competences of the EPPO have been committed, the Member State where most of the offences have been committed.<sup>49</sup> The applicable law is found in the EPPO Regulation itself. However, the national law of the handling delegated prosecutor applies to the extent that a matter is not regulated by this Regulation. Where a matter is governed by both national law and this Regulation, the latter shall prevail.<sup>50</sup>

Regarding the powers of the European delegated prosecutor handling a case, he or she may either undertake the investigation measures and other measures on his or her own, or may instruct the competent authorities in his or her Member State. Those authorities shall, in accordance with national law, ensure that all instructions are followed and undertake the measures assigned to them. The EPPO Regulation does not define operational powers, nor does it define the applicable safeguards and defence rights. This is left to national law, including laws implementing the relevant EU Directives. The Regulation does, however, prescribe which investigative methods should be available for its work.<sup>51</sup> That means that, in cross-border cases, there will be a number of (diverging) national legal systems relevant for the case work of the EPPO.

The system of legal protection in the EPPO Regulation is unique. Unlike any other area of law, the Regulation dictates that procedural acts of the EPPO that are intended to produce legal effects vis-à-vis third parties shall be subject to review by the competent national courts (and not the EU judiciary), in accordance with the requirements and procedures laid down by national law. The competences of the Court of Justice have been reconfirmed in the Regulation only for a limited number of specific situations.<sup>52</sup>

Article 37 of the Regulation is also a particularly relevant provision for legal protection. It deals with the admissibility of evidence in criminal procedures. This article stipulates that evidence presented by the prosecutors of the EPPO or the defendant shall not be denied admission on 'the mere ground that the evidence was gathered in another Member State or in accordance with the law of another Member State'. This rule bridges the diverging national standards that will continue to exist in cases of cross-border evidence gathering. Arguably, it may also introduce a rule of non-inquiry, as the materials must be accepted without further investigation, even though this does not affect the freedom of judge to freely assess the evidence presented. It is unclear whether such a rule would also apply in cases where issues are raised as regards the lawfulness of the investigative work.<sup>53</sup> Because of its indivisible structure, it is highly uncertain to what extent the existing national case law on unlawfully obtained foreign evidence still holds in the specific, integrative setting of the EPPO. That case law, after all, often builds upon the formal separations between the national legal orders involved. Materials that may have been unlawfully obtained in or transferred by another jurisdiction may as a rule be used as evidence, as long as this does not affect the fairness of the trial (the so-called Trennungsprinzip). Such an approach is not easily reconcilable with the EPPO's status as an indivisible organ of EU law.

Finally, the EPPO clearly has a structure that is meant to promote the vertical and horizontal integration of national legal systems. These integrative effects will become visible in the horizontal (cross-border) investigations, but also in the vertical relationships between the EPPO and its national partners. As is the case for OLAF, those partners are very diverse and manifold. They include the national organs responsible for both the expenditure side of the EU budget and the income side. That means that presumably, similar issues will arise for the EPPO as have been noted for OLAF in our studies. The question is to what extent its national partners – who are not defined in the Regulation but are referred to in general as the 'competent national authorities' – will be aware of the European dimension of their tasks and will be given sufficiently wide powers to cooperate and share information with the Office.<sup>54</sup>

III. Law Enforcement in a Composite Legal Order

The authorities that were discussed in section II are indicative of a trend in which EU authorities are made responsible for direct, punitive enforcement of violations of EU law by natural persons or other economic actors. It is also clear, however, that this trend is not the result of a top-down strategy or 'grand design'. Rather, one notices a strong sectoral focus for each of the authorities, where developments towards punitive enforcement by EU authorities have been largely path-dependent and responsive to the specifics of the policy area in play.

Yet, as said, that there are considerable differences between the EU authorities involved should not obfuscate what they have in common, in terms of common features, problems and challenges. In all of their legal frameworks, the relationships between the relevant EU authorities and their national partners are a decisive, institutional characteristic. A system of distinct, dual enforcement jurisdictions, like in the United States (federal level–State level), is non-existent in the EU. The institutional design of the EU authorities is of such a nature that they function as vehicles that connect and integrate the different legal orders of the Member States involved. All of the authorities combine vertical (EU-Member State) and horizontal (inter-state) dimensions in a single institutional framework that has EU-wide operational competence. The EU authorities may be competent to perform acts of investigation themselves, but we have also seen many examples in which national authorities perform such acts on behalf of those authorities. Information that is transferred from national jurisdictions to the EU authorities may end up in their case files, or in case files before courts in another national jurisdiction, after having been transferred by the relevant EU authority. All of this illustrates that the legal frameworks of these authorities are designed for the bundling and pooling of information, staff and resources, with the aim of fulfilling that authority's mandate. In many cases, it will be impossible to clearly differentiate between the horizontal and vertical dimensions of an investigation.

The integrationist models fit well with the qualification of the European legal order as a composite one. That legal order is characterised, first of all, by the way in which it incorporates natural and legal persons in the transnational polity of the EU.<sup>55</sup> Like the national enforcement authorities, individuals have acquired a dual capacity in this legal order. They are no longer only nationals of a certain state. Citizens and other actors that are economically active in the territory of the EU have been awarded, inter alia, enforceable rights vis-à-vis states in transnational affairs and, for EU citizens, rights to participate in the political process at EU level or the local level of the state of residence. The EU is, in the words of the Court of Justice, 'a new legal order, possessing its own institutions, for the benefit of which the Member States thereof have limited their sovereign rights, in ever wider fields, and the subjects of which comprise not only those States but also their nationals.'<sup>56</sup>

The notion of the European legal order of the EU and its Member States as a 'composite' one also emphasises the vertical and horizontal, transnational relationships between the branches of the trias politica. National state branches – whether they are part of the executive, judiciary or the legislature – also have EU tasks to fulfil, such as to ensure that EU rules and policies are effectively enforced and that they cooperate loyally with EU authorities and partners in other states. Vice versa, those branches may expect that their partners in other jurisdictions (including the EU) do the same. These relationships were established for the purpose of achieving a series of common goals and policies, as defined in the Treaty on European Union. To achieve these goals and policies, the European composite legal order deliberately pierces the veil of the participating nation-states and of the national enforcement structures, by regrouping those national structures under a single (yet often complicated) legal framework with EU-wide competences. The same goes, in essence, for the judiciary, which is encouraged to engage in dialogues with the Court of Justice and courts from other states. Their role as juges de droit commun has been emphasised many times in the internal market, and is increasingly becoming clear in the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice.<sup>57</sup>

In this composite institutional setting, it is vital to stress and recognise the importance and relevance of the EU institutions themselves. Even in cases where autonomous investigative powers have been withheld from the EU level, as is the case for OLAF, the coordinative activities that take place within the confines of these EU authorities demonstrate their autonomous value. The EU authorities are not derivatives from national enforcement powers but have an independent, autonomous role to fulfil. Though self-evident for many, there are still many authoritative sources that explicitly question this capacity, certainly in the area of enforcement integration and criminal justice. As has already been noted elsewhere,<sup>58</sup> the added value of the EU in the enforcement landscape rests upon three distinct capacities:

1. The EU offers its Member States the opportunity to regain control over crime-related problems that have become too big for individual states. Those problems require swift and effective cooperation, tackling concerns both of crime control as well as of due process.
2. The EU possesses the instruments to open up national legal systems, if necessary in the area of criminal justice too. Those who strive to regain control over crime can promote not only their own interests and perspectives; they also need to be open to the interests of other legal orders. Common goals, procedures, institutions and narratives are – or rather should be – offered by the EU.
3. Membership of the EU and the constitutional principles on which it is based also imposes what has been called ‘external constitutional discipline’ on the Member States, and one that is particularly important in law enforcement these days.

It matters a great deal how one views the institutional design of the EU authorities and their national partners. A perspective from which EU actors are presented as mere coordinative bodies, facilitating national authorities in the realisation of their tasks and duties, will inevitably conceal a number of pertinent questions and issues of real concern to individuals and enforcement authorities. Yet, as said, this perspective is still omnipresent in the area of criminal law enforcement, where institutions such as the EPPO or OLAF have been qualified by some as bodies of enforcement coordination, ultimately supporting the national legal orders. From that perspective, the main focus remains on what is needed – in terms of effective enforcement, as well as legal protection – in the legal orders of the individual Member States. Accordingly, there is less need to grant these bodies full operational autonomy or to revise national enforcement structures in light of their existence, nor is there a real need to rethink fundamental rights in light of their composite setting.

State sovereignty in the area of criminal justice can also be maintained via another technique. The limited punitive competences of a small number of distinct, highly specialised administrative EU authorities, such as in banking law or competition law, means that the domain of national enforcement, and particularly that of criminal justice, remains largely unaffected. Also from this perspective, criminal enforcement remains a national affair, largely unaffected by the development of direct enforcement.

The empirical lens of a composite legal order, by contrast, leads to questions of a different evaluative and normative nature. Composite enforcement starts from the viewpoint that though nation-states remain distinct, autonomous entities, their interactions with the EU and other states are guided by a series of rules and principles that serve common goals and are inevitably geared towards further (enforcement) integration.<sup>59</sup> Enforcement by EU authorities is consequently not only the responsibility of those authorities, but also that of the Member States and the three branches of the trias. Not only do EU Member States need to open up, but they are also in need of a common narrative regarding what effective law enforcement is and what constitutes effective legal protection in a transnational setting. Yet before we delve further into the implications of our composite lens for the central questions of this book, it is necessary to clarify one more concept – that of EU enforcement authorities and their relationships to national criminal justice.

IV. Composite Enforcement Procedures

While the notion of the European legal order as ‘a composite’ refers to the European legal order of the EU and its Member States, the notion of composite enforcement is a species of it, presented in this volume as the conceptual lens for a study into punitive law enforcement by EU authorities. Composite enforcement procedures reconcile the seemingly contradictory notions of EU-wide territorial competences on the one hand, and decentralisation and subsidiarity on the other. These EU-wide competences are achieved by removing traditional mutual administrative assistance arrangements from the operational frameworks of the authorities. Decentralisation and subsidiarity bring to the fore that, one way or another, national legal orders remain a significant factor in the applicable legal instruments. The EU authorities continue to rely on the input of national legal orders, either because national enforcement are part of and act under the responsibility of those EU authorities, and/or because national law must be applied during their enforcement activities, in addition to or implementing EU rules.

The consequence of this structure is that it is not always easy to differentiate between those elements of the tasks of national authorities that are part and parcel of the legal frameworks of the EU authorities and tasks that remain in the national domain. The European competition network, for instance, combines the composite procedures of the Commission itself and simultaneously coordinates the enforcement procedures by national competition authorities. A more precise conceptual delineation of composite enforcement procedures is therefore necessary, also because it may have normative implications for the applicable frameworks.

Respect for national procedural autonomy, subsidiarity and the consequent fragmentation of the applicable legal rules cannot do away with the fact that composite enforcement is meant to establish a certain degree of coherence. There can be no ‘composite’ without it. There are two elements that distinguish composite procedures from being merely a set of related yet distinct enforcement procedures. To start with, coherence shows itself by taking account of the connections between the different stages of the enforcement procedure, starting from the stage when investigations are initiated, to the stage when decisions on the follow-up are made, to the stage when punitive procedures are ultimately conducted and concluded, at either the EU or the national level. To be part of a composite enforcement procedure means that each of these different stages is without meaning in and of itself, and that those stages are connected through legal arrangements. The procedures are capable of leading to punitive sanctions, although this need not necessarily be the goal from the start of the proceedings.

Second, for a procedure to be a composite within the scope of this project, the gathering of the relevant information or the subsequent imposition of the sanction must be the responsibility either of the EU authority itself, or a national authority subsuming its place by legal arrangements or a national authority that operates under the auspices of that EU authority. The last element – that of acting ‘under the auspices of’ – does not imply that there is a legal obligation of the national authority to achieve a specific, prescribed result.<sup>60</sup> Rather, for national authorities to be acting ‘under the auspices of’, they must be under the legal obligation to continue the procedures or execute specific measures if ‘requested’, ‘instructed’ or even ‘ordered’ to do so by the EU authority. Whether or not such an obligation exists depends on the degree of discretion that is left to national authorities to formally decline such a request or instruction. For such discretion to be absent, the request, order or instruction should fall within the scope of the applicable legal instruments and leave the national authorities no formal possibilities (refusal grounds) to decline it. The required absence of discretion, therefore, relates to what is called in international criminal law the granting decision of the national authorities, that is, to the decision to provide assistance to the EU authority.<sup>61</sup> The principle of loyal cooperation then takes precedence and such requests are to be executed, though it follows from that same principle that the EU authority, in turn, pays due attention to legitimate objections that may exist on the national side and seeks to accommodate those objections. That the subsequent execution of the request may remain within the hands of the national authority does not change its qualification as being part of a composite structure. National authorities are under a duty to deliver a reasonable degree of effort to achieve the result, in accordance with their national laws and obviously without interfering with such rights as the presumption of innocence.

To show the different ways in which procedures can be composite by nature, it is helpful to re-introduce the model that the present author and John Vervaele used in the first Hercule study on the stage of information gathering, yet with some slight adjustments.<sup>62</sup> Three factors are key in it:

1. The issue of which authority is the acting authority, that is, the authority that ultimately performs the investigative acts. Is this the EU authority itself or its national partner (on behalf of the EU authority or in its own name)?

<sup>60</sup> That, in turn, also has consequences for the remedies available, see ch 3 of this volume (Ligeti and Robinson).

<sup>61</sup> On that concept, see M Böse, M Bröcker and A Schneider (eds), Judicial Protection in Transnational Criminal Proceedings (Springer 2021); A Eser, O Lagodny and L Blakesley (eds), The Individual as Subject of International Cooperation in Criminal Matters: A Comparative Study (Nomos 2002).

<sup>62</sup> The following models are derived from that report, M Luchtman and J Vervaele, ‘Comparison of the Legal Frameworks’ in MJJP Luchtman et al, Investigatory Powers and Procedural Safeguards: Improving OLAF’s Legislative Framework through a Comparison with Other EU Law Enforcement Authorities (ECN/ESMA/ECB) (Utrecht University 2017) 248.

2. The issue of whether the national partner functionally becomes a part of the EU organisation, or whether assistance is provided to the EU authority by the national partner as a representative of its national administration.
3. The issue of who instructs the national partners: are instructions provided by the EU authority, or through the national chains of command?

On the basis of these factors, we distinguished a number of models for composite enforcement:

1. Autonomous investigative acts (Vor-Ort-Kontrolle).<sup>63</sup> In this model, EU authorities perform the investigative acts themselves. This means that the laws to be applied are mostly EU regulations and that the remedies are, in principle, to be found at the EU level. Although national authorities are usually allowed to be present, their assistance is not related to the performance of their own tasks. It is seen as administrative assistance, Amtshilfe,<sup>64</sup> and mostly comprises the use of coercive power in cases of non-cooperation or assistance of a practical nature. Physical force remains, after all, a power that is only available to the national authorities. National authorities are under the obligation to provide that assistance, and apply their own national laws in that process.

We can find examples of acts of Amtshilfe in all legal frameworks, for instance in Regulation 2185/96 for OLAF (on-the-spot checks), Articles 20 and 21 of Regulation 1/2003 (DG Competition), and on-site inspections within the framework of the ECB and ESMA. Here, we can already note major differences between the OLAF framework and those of other authorities. Whereas OLAF does have the power to perform on-the-spot checks, it is highly dependent in law and practice on its national partners. The applicable Regulations do not provide for autonomous powers or means to deal with a lack of cooperation by economic actors. This is different for DG Competition and the ECB.

2. Mandated investigations, or even Organleihe. In this constellation too, EU authorities lead the investigations but national authorities also have a clear role, which certainly exceeds the mere 'opening of doors'. Both models (mandates and Organleihe) have in common that the investigative acts of the national partners are ascribed to the EU authorities; national authorities perform tasks on behalf of the EU authorities (not in their own name).<sup>65</sup> The law to be applied is usually (directly applicable) EU law. Where EU authorities give such orders and retain the power of oversight and to act themselves, we speak of mandated delegations.<sup>66</sup> The (gradual) difference between a mandate and Organleihe is that, in the latter case, the (national) authority also becomes a part of the EU structure in legal terms; participating states lose control over their authorities, which act as a functional part of the EU authority. They operate within the framework of EU laws.<sup>67</sup>

It is submitted that the two models can be found in the ESMA (delegation) and ECB frameworks (joint supervisory teams, possibly also on-site inspection teams). Article 30 CRAR deals with delegation.<sup>68</sup> That article holds that ESMA may also require competent authorities to carry out specific investigatory tasks and on-site inspections as provided for in the Regulation. National partners then have the same powers as ESMA.<sup>69</sup>

Organleihe appears to be the most accurate form to qualify the cooperation between the ECB and NCAs for significant entities in the framework of joint supervisory teams (responsible for the monitoring of significant entities), as defined in the SMM Framework Regulation. Also the position of European (Delegated) Prosecutors in the EPPO framework resembles the features of an Organleihe.<sup>70</sup>

3. Assistance (Amtshilfe), including instructions. This is the oldest and most well-known form of interaction. Administrative assistance means that, upon the request of the EU authorities, national authorities perform specific acts of investigation in their own name, but for the fulfilment of the tasks of the EU authorities (not for their own tasks therefore). In principle, they apply national laws (which may have been harmonised). Amtshilfe as such creates no changes in the legislative framework of the requested party (in terms of its powers, for instance).<sup>71</sup> Hierarchically, the assisting national authorities do not take instructions from their EU partners but via their national chains of command in the execution of such acts. However, though Amtshilfe constructions originate from international law,<sup>72</sup> the legal regimes of the EU authorities that we have studied often no longer show a degree of discretion for national authorities to kindly refuse such ‘requests’ for assistance. Though such ‘requests’ may not (and often cannot) entail a duty to achieve a specific result, they do contain an obligation of effort. That is why I consider them as a part of composite procedures.

Examples of Amtshilfe are found in the legal frameworks of ESMA and the ECB, where they mostly refer to providing assistance to the relevant authorities in cases of opposition. A similar provision is found in Article 4 of OLAF Regulation 2185/96. Within the setting of competition law, DG Competition has the power to ‘ask’ national partners to collect evidence on its behalf, applying their own law (Article 22(2) Regulation 1/2003). The latter power is somewhat different from the other types of mutual assistance within the framework of EU authorities, as the national competition authority then performs acts of <sup>69</sup> The question, incidentally, is to what extent Art 30 truly concerns a delegation, ie a transfer, of powers. The legal construction of the provision rather resembles a mandated power. The construction, after all, does not affect the responsibility of ESMA and does not limit ESMA’s ability to conduct and oversee the delegated activity (Art 30(4) CRAR). A different opinion can be found in ch 4 of this volume (Böse and Schneider).

<sup>71</sup> Of course, those powers and safeguards may have been harmonised by EU law (case law and legislation).

<sup>72</sup> The term ‘mutual administrative assistance’ is used in the setting of international law, the word ‘mutual’ illustrating the element of reciprocity. That element is usually absent in the top-down types of assistance in composite procedures.

investigation individually, but on behalf of DG Competition and applying EU law.<sup>73</sup> This provision appears to be rarely used.<sup>74</sup>

A category related to ‘mutual assistance’ is the instructions, available in the SSM framework.<sup>75</sup> Instructions allow the ECB to oblige the national partner/NCA to use powers or take further procedural steps that are not available to the ECB itself. The applicable legal regime is the regime of the agent, not the principal EU authority. Likewise, the consequences of the acts are, in principle, not imputed to the EU authority.<sup>76</sup>

Table 1.1 Different models for interaction between EU authorities and national partners; the role of national partners

	Autonomous	Organleihe	Mandate	Assistance
Acting authority is ...	EU authority	national	national	national
Act is part of ...	EU organisation	EU	national	national
Instructions via ...	EU hierarchy	EU	EU	national

The models illustrate the different modalities of how national authorities can assist their EU partners in composite procedures and how their actions are imputed to the respective national or EU legal orders. As a rule of thumb, the differences between the specific legal regimes will have consequences, for instance for the applicable law (on powers, safeguards, evidence,<sup>77</sup> etc), the legal remedies available and for questions of political accountability.<sup>78</sup> Yet these differences are not decisive for their qualification as being a part of administrative composite procedures.

Composite administrative procedures not only cover the vertical or ‘multilevel’ relationships between the authority and its partners in a specific legal order, they also relate to the more horizontal relationships between the many national legal orders in <sup>73</sup> This is why one may doubt whether this is really mutual assistance or rather a different type of assistance. Most academic writings qualify it as mutual administrative assistance; see M Böse, ‘The System of Vertical and Horizontal Cooperation in Administrative Investigations in EU Competition Cases’ in K Ligeti (ed), Toward a Prosecutor for the European Union, vol 1: A Comparative Analysis (Hart Publishing 2012) 840.

<sup>75</sup> Arguably, instructions may also be regarded as a separate category, particularly where they are so specific that national partners are left without discretion. In that situation, national lines of hierarchy are less relevant. The difference between instructions and mandated investigations is that, under the latter regime, one cannot transfer more powers than one has oneself. In that respect, instructions come closer to mutual administrative assistance. In fact, some mutual assistance regimes are so specific in their terms and conditions that the differences between the two forms have become small. That is why the two forms have been placed in a single category.

<sup>76</sup> See L Wissink et al, ‘Shifts in Competences between Member States and the EU in the New Supervisory System for Credit Institutions and their Consequences for Judicial Protection’ (2014) 10 Utrecht Law Review 110. This may be different where discretion for national authorities is fully absent; see A Witte, ‘The Application of National Banking Supervision Law by the ECB: Three Parallel Modes of Executing EU Law?’ [2014] Maastricht Journal of European and Comparative Law 89.

<sup>78</sup> There are some tricky areas, particularly when national authorities are left with no discretion by the EU authorities but their actions do affect the position of individuals and undertakings; cf Witte (n 75) 97–103; P Schammo, ‘EU Day-to-Day Supervision or Intervention-based Supervision: Which Way Forward for the European System of Financial Supervision’ (2012) 32 OJLS 771, 785–86. This particularly holds true for mandated investigations and instructions.

the context of composite procedures. It is certainly thinkable, for instance, that materials collected in the Netherlands end up in a punitive enforcement procedure in, say, Greece. The legal arrangements that aim to achieve the necessary degree of ‘horizontal’ coherence often remain implicit in the legal frameworks. That does not mean that they are not there. The dominant model within the scope of this project is the hierarchical (or ‘star-pattern’) model, in which the interactions between legal orders essentially run through the EU authority (cf OLAF, DG Competition, the ECB). The resulting focus of these models on the vertical axis of coherence conceals that important decisions on case allocation, the applicable law, etc are made within the confines of the EU authorities, but often without a clear framework.<sup>79</sup>

There are also collegial (or ‘web pattern’) models, based on joint decision-making structures, such as within the EPPO. It is not coincidental that the latter type of models usually include rules for case allocation or forum choices. It is also not without reason that in the EPPO structure, its ‘indivisibility’ has been explicitly confirmed in its founding Regulation.<sup>80</sup> There is no reason to do this in star-pattern models. For web patterns, however, it is absolutely vital.

V. The Lens of Compositeness: Implications and Research Questions

As composite procedures are intended to achieve a certain degree of coherence, legal questions follow from them, relating to the (foreseeability of the) applicable law, judicial protection and the scope of fundamental rights. The lens of punitive enforcement by EU authorities through composite processes certainly has analytical and normative implications. I will highlight two of those in the remainder of this chapter. Using such a lens implies, first of all, that even though decentralisation and diversity are an intrinsic part of their legal design, these procedures also require coherence in terms of the foreseeability of the applicable legal rules. It makes a difference for questions of legal protection or the foreseeability of legal rules whether or not individuals and legal persons are confronted with these questions in the framework of enforcement procedures that are conducted in parallel by different authorities or within a composite framework, under the responsibility of an EU authority. The latter framework should offer those individuals, and also the involved authorities, sufficient clarity on the applicable legal rules, at the relevant stages in the procedure.<sup>81</sup>

The second implication touches upon the relationships with national criminal justice. Composite enforcement procedures allocate the responsibilities between and within the different enforcement stages to actors from different legal orders. They are characterised by a high degree of organisational or decisional interdependence and coherence. It is clear that criminal justice as such is not, save for the EPPO, a part of the composite enforcement structures that we have studied. There are good reasons, however, not to exclude criminal justice from this book's scope. By their very definition, the ties between administrative enforcement and criminal enforcement are tight. First of all, punitive administrative enforcement regimes serve as alternatives to criminal justice, for various reasons. Administrative enforcement regimes may, for instance, have been introduced to decriminalise certain behaviour or because of the advantages that administrative enforcement structures bring, including the presence of highly specialised administrative agencies. Moreover, administrative and criminal investigations often run in parallel and have complementary functions. This shows itself in the complementary goals that both types of enforcement may have and in the temporal connections between them, as socio-economic crime often will remain undisclosed – and criminal justice mechanisms therefore ineffective – without administrative enforcement.

In a composite setting, the interactions between the many legal orders that are involved add to the legal challenges. For instance, one of the most pressing issues in the area of EU fraud is why the composite enforcement procedures by OLAF still do not connect to the final stages of those procedures, that is, the stage when administrative investigations lead to punitive or non-punitive follow-up, particularly at national level.<sup>82</sup> Composite enforcement procedures by OLAF have been confined to the stages of investigation and do not regulate the stages of prosecution and sanctioning at national level. Yet with OLAF procedures regarded as distinct, separate procedures, the connection to national follow-up, criminal or administrative, remains loose. Follow-up is still a predominantly national affair, even after the recent revision of the OLAF framework. Clearly, this can have implications, both for the effective enforcement of EU law, for the legal protection of persons concerned, as well as for the overall legitimacy of OLAF's – and the EU's – operations. This issue also has a flip side: OLAF investigations of course do influence the work of national authorities – administrative and criminal alike – in a way that is not always in line with their own priorities, policies or standards. Though the OLAF framework remains puzzling and rather loose, it does require national authorities to respond.<sup>83</sup> Under the recently revised framework, the EU legislator focused mainly on the relationships between OLAF and the EPPO, and left this part of the puzzle largely untouched.

Also in other areas of EU law and policy, the relationships between composite administrative enforcement and criminal justice are underregulated or even deliberately disconnected. Authorities such as the ECB and DG Competition have the power to impose administrative sanctions themselves, or can entrust their national partners to do so, yet their institutional frameworks do not regulate the relationships with criminal justice actors. In fact, in competition law, the provision of information for purposes other than those for which it was originally obtained is said to be at odds with the rights of the defence.<sup>84</sup> However, because such information may be taken into account to justify the initiation of a national procedure, the overlap in scope of composite administrative and national criminal investigations cannot be disregarded and causes many other complications, in terms both of the effective enforcement of EU laws and policies, as well as the protection of the individual.<sup>85</sup>

<sup>83</sup> Art 11(3) of the revised OLAF Regulation reads, inter alia, 'The competent authorities of the Member State concerned ... shall take such action as the results of the external investigation warrant and shall report thereon to the Office within a time limit laid down in the recommendations ... and, in addition, at the request of the Office.' See also, however, Recital 30 of Regulation 2020/2223: 'In accordance with the settled case-law of the CJEU, the Office recommendations included in its reports have no binding legal effects on such authorities of Member States or on institutions, bodies, offices and agencies.'

Therefore, as is the case in purely national cases of enforcement, composite enforcement procedures under the auspices of EU authorities inevitably will have links with criminal justice. There are temporal links, in which criminal justice is the necessary follow-up to administrative investigations or in which both set of procedures run in parallel. There are also substantive and personal links, because the facts and persons under investigation in administrative and criminal procedures will be the same or be closely related to one another. In a large number of these cases, national judicial authorities are also in the process of implementing EU law and, hence, acting within the scope of EU law. This also occurs in cases where ordinary criminal offences, such as forgery, are used as the basis for prosecution for violations of substantive norms of EU law.<sup>86</sup> That, in turn, means that the provisions of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights are applicable, and that the mechanisms for cooperation between EU authorities and national criminal justice authorities should be an integral part of the scope of this study, from the perspective both of the effective enforcement of EU law, as well as that of the legal protection of individuals. Criminal justice is not a distinct, separate domain but is part and parcel of the same policy that EU administrative authorities serve to implement. Consequently, both sets of procedures should be aligned to prevent problems with, for instance, the ne bis in idem principle or the privilege against self-incrimination.

The lens of composite punitive enforcement thus pushes to the fore two different perspectives and related questions. There is an internal perspective, focusing on the legal architecture of the relevant models and on the legal position of the many authorities involved therein, as well as the position of the individuals concerned. Furthermore, there is the external perspective in which the relationships of composite punitive enforcement with national criminal justice are taken on-board. As indicated in the Introduction, our research questions are:

- What models for composite enforcement do currently exist?
- What constitutional parameters define and guide the interactions between the many authorities from the involved legal orders?
- What powers do these authorities need for the effective fulfilment of their punitive tasks, during the consecutive stages of the enforcement process? And what may individuals expect from these authorities in turn; are their rights, safeguards and remedies guaranteed?

- How does EU administrative enforcement relate to (national) criminal justice?

All of these questions are linked both to the EU and to the national levels. They relate not only to the executive branches, but also to the other two branches of government. Moreover, they involve cross-policy considerations in relation to the domain of criminal justice and vice versa.

The following chapters of this book focus on the main constitutional parameters for composite enforcement (chapters 2 and 3), on the exemplary models for composite enforcement (chapters 4–6), on a number of topical issues regarding EU enforcement authorities and their relations with the national legal orders (chapters 7–9). The book concludes with a series of overarching observations and an outlook towards the EPPO (chapters 10 and 11).
